Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The blockade is a bilateral matter between the Governments of Cuba and the United States. For our part, we operate no such embargo and have full diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend find it difficult to answer questions from the Opposition about Cuba when they follow questions which revealed the Opposition's attitude towards the democratically elected Government of Italy, a member of the European Union? Although I have views on that matter, I accept that that Government were democratically elected. Is not it difficult to answer people who ask questions in such conflicting ways?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is obvious that the Opposition are operating a double standard. They are happy to recognise and have relations with non-elected Ministers in Cuba, which is the point of my hon. Friend's question, yet we have just heard from Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen that they would refuse to meet or recognise five elected and duly appointed Ministers of the new Italian Government. They would therefore be willing to overlook, ignore and show contempt for the democratically elected Government of modern Italy.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Has the Minister had a chance to read the report, published in May this year, of the Caribbean Trade Advisory Group, which advises the Foreign Office? It calls for a joint effort by Britain and Germany to reach an agreement on co-operation between the European Union and Cuba, so that the transition taking place in Cuba can proceed in a way that will bring stability to that area and trade to this country.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman may know that the Caribbean Trade Advisory Group visited Cuba last year and again last month. The object of those visits was to improve bilateral trade between our two countries. That is of more immediate importance than the longer-term, structural relationship between the EU and Cuba, although that may be developing on a parallel track.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not it the case that in central America and the Caribbean area security tensions have been considerably reduced since the central American republics, in contrast to Cuba, returned to democracy and since, following the defeat of the Sandinista regime, Nicaragua reduced its armed forces? Should not we be more concerned with introducing democracy and human rights into Cuba?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I agree. All Latin American countries now have civilian Governments, with the exception of Cuba. We look forward to an improvement in the human rights record of Cuba and we constantly urge her to allow free and fair elections.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister accept that the blockade of Cuba that has been carried on by the USA since 1959 is an appalling interference in one nation's affairs by another? Does he recognise that the lives of the people of Cuba have been severely damaged by it? Other Governments have managed to trade successfully and normally with Cuba. Why will not he put pressure on the United States to lift the blockade and recognise Cuban Governments once and for all?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have already said in answer to another question that that is a matter between the Cuban and the American Government, but, to repeat the point, we have developing trade relations with Cuba as well as normal diplomatic relations.

Italy

14. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has met members of the new Italian Government to discuss recent developments in the European Union.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met the new Italian Foreign Minister at the Foreign Affairs Council in Brussels on 16 and 17 May 1994.

Mr. Thompson: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is vital that there are good links between the European Union and the emerging eastern European countries? In his recent discussions with the new Italian Government, has he had a chance to discuss joint projects to further the support and links between the European Union and eastern Europe?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend had a successful and constructive meeting with Signor Martino, the new Italian Foreign Minister, and it was agreed to carry forward a joint initiative to develop foreign policy and justice and home affairs relations between the European Union and the newly emergent democracies of central and eastern Europe.

Mr. Galloway: Is not it true that although Signor Fini and the MSI fascists in Italy were democratically elected, so were Signor Mussolini and Herr Hitler before them? Cannot the Government sense at least some unease in this country, as we celebrate the anniversaries currently, about the fact that British men left their bones in the soil of Europe to liberate this continent from fascism, yet fascism is back in the elected Government of Italy?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman's record of support for non-elected dictators is not altogether an honourable one, but I can repeat the important point that those newly elected Italian Ministers have made quite clear their support and respect for the 1948 Italian constitution, which is fully democratic in all respects.

Mr. Dykes: Can my hon. Friend reassure the House that Signor Martino is extremely enthusiastic about the Maastricht treaty and the European Union?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We are all enthusiastic about the Maastricht treaty and the European Union.

Mr. Janner: Did the Foreign Secretary raise with the Italian Foreign Secretary the concern, which I know is felt on both sides of the House, about the resurgence of neo-fascism in Italy? Did he discuss it at all with his opposite number and does he share the concern that so many of us feel about the growth of fascism and racism in so many parts of Europe?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Of course, we would be concerned if there was a resurgence of fascism in Italy. It was precisely because we are assured about the democratic credentials and aims of the new Italian Government that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met the new Italian Government and agreed a programme of future developments with that Government.

Argentina

16. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British relations with Argentina.

Mr. Hurd: We have made some good progress in many areas. There are regular high-level contacts. British exports to Argentina grew by 50 per cent. last year and there are good investment opportunities. We continue to disagree about sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, but we have an agreement on fisheries conservation and we expect to meet the Argentines next month to discuss oil. We also co-operate internationally; for example, British and Argentine troops are working side by side in UN peacekeeping operations, both in the former Yugoslavia and in Cyprus.

Mr. Coombs: May I tell my right hon. Friend of the great pleasure given to the Falkland islanders and to their many friends in this country and around the world by his visit to the islands earlier this year? Does he agree that as long as Argentina retains its claim of sovereignty over the islands, there will inevitably be a black cloud over our efforts to improve relations with it? What part of the Government's policy is it now to persuade the Argentine Government to drop that claim so as to guarantee the long-term safety and security of the Falklands?

Mr. Hurd: I thoroughly enjoyed my visit to the islands after Easter and I learned a lot from it and from the islanders. My hon. Friend is right: we have managed to make good progress on other matters with the Argentine Government, setting aside the disagreement over sovereignty, which remains.

My hon. Friend is perfectly right to say that, once it is possible for Argentina to drop her claim to sovereignty, the possibilities of co-operation in the south Atlantic, to the benefit of both countries and of the islanders, will be very great indeed.

Mr. Tony Banks: In the event of President Menem requesting the extradition of Baroness Thatcher to face various charges in Argentina, will the British Government give him their full co-operation? I suspect that if they did, it might do something to restore their flagging popularity.

Mr. Hurd: No such request has been made.

Mauritius

17. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with Mauritius.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We enjoy a close and constructive relationship with Mauritius.

Mr. Greenway: I thank my hon. Friend for that fine reply. Does he accept that Britain is popular in Mauritius and that Mr. Jugnauth and his Government are very friendly towards this country because of their close educational links with it? If he agrees, how is he seeking to extend that principle?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Mauritian Foreign Minister recently said that relations are entering a new period of understanding and co-operation, and he has seen my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary twice in the past year.

As for education, under an agreement called the Laureate scheme, we are providing nearly £3 million over a five year period to fund scholarships which enable 13 Mauritians to come to Britain as students.

China

18. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the United Kingdom's relationship with the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Goodlad: We attach considerable importance to maintaining and building on our wide-ranging relationship with China. We have already achieved a number of successes: for instance, our exports to China in 1993 were 72 per cent. higher than in 1992. We continue to make representations to the People's Republic on human rights issues. A key aspect of the relationship is Hong Kong. Although we have not yet resolved our recent disagreement over the detailed constitutional arrangements for Hong Kong, our immediate priority is to develop a co-operative relationship in other areas, such as the work of the joint liaison group and the new airport in Hong Kong.

Mr. Davidson: Will the Government continue to press the Government of the People's Republic of China on the issue of human rights, not only in China but in the future Hong Kong? As the Government are no doubt aware, many in this country are worried that human rights in Hong Kong will be severely eroded once the colony is taken over by China. What assurances can he give us that that will not happen?

Mr. Goodlad: Human rights in China, including the situation in Tibet, are a matter of deep concern. They are on the agenda at every ministerial meeting and we and our European Union partners have repeatedly urged the Chinese authorities to adhere to internationally recognised standards of behaviour and to improve their human rights record.

The Hong Kong bill of rights gives local effect to the international covenant on civil and political rights, and the body of local human rights jurisprudence is steadily accumulating. The joint declaration of 1984 provides that the international covenant will continue to apply to Hong Kong after 1997. The joint declaration also guarantees the continuation of Hong Kong's existing legal system.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will my right hon. Friend enlighten us as to what line the Chinese Government are taking over the nuclear activities of North Korea? Does he agree that if any encouragement is given to North Korea to export nuclear arms or equipment to, say, the middle east, it could be very serious for the security of the world?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend raises a serious matter. We are in close touch with the Chinese in the Security Council. The Chinese are in favour of a denuclearised Korean peninsula, but say that the North Korean issue should be dealt with through negotiations. We believe that China has privately urged North Korea to act responsibly. It was associated with two statements by the president of the Security Council urging North Korea to co-operate with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Consultations are under way in New York on a possible sanctions resolution, after the flagrant breach by North Korea of the nuclear safeguards agreement and, of course, we hope for Chinese co-operation.

On the middle east, China is co-operating with both Pakistan and Iran on civil nuclear projects. We encourage China to behave responsibly and will continue to encourage it to join and abide by guidelines through the nuclear supplies group.

Mr. Gapes: In view of the position in Hong Kong, does the Minister support the proposals made by many people there, and by the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, for a human rights commission to be established so that human rights can be protected after 1997?

Mr. Goodlad: The Government are considering the report of the Select Committee very carefully and will respond in due course.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious concern in China about the new restrictions introduced by the EC on imports of items such as toys and shoes? Although I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on having voted against the decision by the EC, does he agree that it is totally inconsistent with GATT and that it destroys jobs in China and many jobs in the United Kingdom as well?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is right. The United Kingdom voted against the quotas package at the Foreign Affairs Council on 8 February, because we did not believe that the quotas introduced, particularly on toys, were justified. During the negotiations, we succeeded in getting some proposals for quotas withdrawn and other proposed quotas, including toys, increased, although not enough. We are pressing the Commission to show extra flexibility in the management of quotas, particularly to enable goods already contracted for before the February decision to be exempted from quota limits. We shall also seek an early review of quotas in the hope of securing increases or, better still, their abolition.

Middle East

19. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from consular officials in Jerusalem on the implementation of peace agreements in the west bank and Gaza.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The reports are frequent, relevant and highly informative.

Mr. Burden: Does the Minister agree that unless the peace process in the middle east goes forward it could rapidly go into reverse? What plans do the Government have to increase the amount of practical assistance being given by Britain to the Palestine National Authority, other than in policing? Will he particularly consider assistance through secondments along the lines of the know-how fund?

Mr. Hogg: On the latter part of the question, the British Government's support, bilateral and multilateral, is around £70 million over the next three years. As to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, it is important that there should be early progress. I should like to see Mr. Arafat back in Jericho. It is very important that the Palestinians take control in the five sectoral areas covered by the September agreement. Perhaps most important, it is very urgent that the parties get down to the final stage of the negotiations as speedily as possible.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the recent hijacking of a Lebanese citizen from Lebanese territory by the Israeli defence forces did nothing to help the peace process in that part of the world? Have suitable comments been passed to the Israeli Government? On reflection, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the timing of the announcement to lift the arms embargo on Israel was a little unfortunate?

Mr. Hogg: I do not seek to justify the Israelis' hijacking of the gentleman from Lebanon. Let me also say that that does not promote the release of Ron Arad, if he is alive. Nevertheless, his continued detention is a disgrace and he should be released by whoever is holding him.

Mr. Gunnell: The Minister will be aware that there seems to have been some hold-up in the provision of money for the Palestine National Authority. People are said to be concerned about accounting procedures. Does the Minister agree that this may prove to be a "Catch-22"? Without the money, the accounting procedures cannot be set up; without the accounting procedures, the authority cannot obtain the money. Is not it possible to engage in discussions with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency—in fact, I believe that Ministers have already done so—to ensure that proper accounting procedures can be set up, through UNRWA, to enable administrative help to go into Gaza and Jericho as rapidly as possible?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is right: there have been discussions, which took place on 8 June. As a result of those discussions, some $40 million of additional money has been pledged. However, the hon. Gentleman should not overlook the importance of proper accounting and disbursement procedures, without which the money might go astray.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you confirm whether you have received an application today for a private notice question on the rail dispute?

Madam Speaker: I do not confirm one way or the other whether I have received an application for a private notice question. The hon. Gentleman might care to rephrase his point of order; I shall do my best to be helpful.

Mr. Dunn: Can you confirm, Madam Speaker, that you are in a position to receive an application for a private notice question on the rail dispute? Today, the work and lives of many thousands of my constituents have been disrupted by the actions of a trade union, which all the contenders for the Labour party leadership have signally failed to condemn. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. Private notice questions must come to my office before 12 o'clock, as I think the entire House is aware.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Would it be helpful for me to instruct the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) on procedure, as he clearly does not understand it? It is well in order for the Government to make a statement on any issue—

Madam Speaker: Order. I want no instruction on how I should behave in the Chair. I have just informed the House that private notice questions are looked at by me at 12 o'clock, and decisions are then made.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it related?

Mr. Coombs: No, Madam Speaker, it is an entirely different point of order. Given the craven attitude of Opposition Members to the rail unions that have caused such enormous—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Coombs rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat immediately, or I shall name him. I am tired of listening to points of order that are not points of order, and of the way in which points of order are abused in the House.

Mr. Coombs rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat. If he has a point of order for me to deal with which does not refer to the behaviour of other hon. Members, I will listen to it, but I will listen to it only if it concerns me as Speaker. The hon. Gentleman must now determine how he will behave following that warning.

Mr. Coombs: My point of order does relate to your duties as Speaker, Madam Speaker. I was going to ask whether the attitude of Opposition Members to the rail unions—which is not unrelated to the fact that many of them are sponsored by trade unions, and in particular by the rail unions—ought not, in the circumstances, be referred—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is well aware that that is not a point of order for me. He has totally abused my faith in him. Now may we get on with the procedures of the House?

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTION

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay

That the Estimates set out hereunder be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee:

Class XIV	Vote 17	Education, Arts and Libraries, Scotland.
Class XIV	Vote 18	Student Awards, Scotland.

[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Hereditary Peers (Democratic Rights)

3.35 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish the right of hereditary peers and peeresses to sit in the House of Lords; to establish their right to vote in general elections and to stand for election to the House of Commons; and for connected purposes.

In spending so much time, as the House does, on detailed, complex and intricate legislation, we sometimes miss the glaringly obvious. My Bill deals with the glaringly obvious — that in a democracy it is absurd that people should inherit the right to legislate.

My Bill does not attempt to deal with the overall question of the reform of the House of Lords or whether we need a second Chamber. It deals simply with hereditary members of the peerage.

The House of Lords has the most bizarre and indefensible composition of any parliamentary chamber in the world. At the last count, there were 1,203 Members of the Lords, 759 of whom inherited their title. Those 759 peers are there because they were born in the right bed at the right time.

I need hardly remind the House of the bizarre ways in which those 759 people came to obtain their titles— they are varied and colourful. The dukes are a prime example. Four of the dukes— of Buccleuch and Queensberry, of Grafton, of Richmond Lennox and Gordon and of Saint Albans— are descendants of the various mistresses of Charles II. One is by Lucy Walter, one by Barbara Villiers, one by Louise de Kérouaille and the other by Nell Gwynne.

I have nothing against Charles II's mistresses or their descendants, but I cannot for the life of me see why they should inherit the right to legislate.

If my Bill were passed, it would not make much difference to the lives of those people. When the figures were last checked, one of those dukes was on permanent leave of absence and the other three attended on just 32 occasions out of a possible 736 attendances. Of the 759 hereditary peers, no fewer than 70 per cent. attended fewer than 5 per cent. of sittings and 44 per cent.— 333 peers — did not attend the Lords at all.

We are frequently told by traditionalists that the hereditary peerage is just a quaint British custom and that it does no harm or damage, so why bother with it? Sadly, that is not true.

Neither can it be said that there is any received wisdom among those hereditary peers. One of the most important votes in the Lords in recent years was the poll tax vote on 23 May 1988. The Lords had a chance to stop a Bill that everyone, apart from the then Conservative party, knew was ludicrous and that now everyone, including the Conservative party, knows was ludicrous. Their lordships were solidly in favour of the poll tax— 317 were in favour and 183 were against. That made a total of 500, so 702 either abstained, could not make it to the Chamber or did not understand the question.

The attendance of 500 was one of the biggest this century. Hon. Members may have read that one of their lordships said in the debate that one of the nice things about the debate was that one met so many old friends that one had not seen for many years.

It is not always realised that the hereditary peers passed the poll tax legislation. The life peers voted marginally against— 125 to 97— but the hereditary peers tipped the balance, with 54 against and 220 in favour. So much for the common sense of the aristocracy.

That vote should come as no surprise to us, because their lordships vote, as we do most of the time, according to party affiliation. Of the 759 hereditary peers, only 364 are listed as supporting a political party. Of those, 12 are Labour, 24 are Liberal Democrats and 328 are Conservatives. If I were to include the other 395 who have not answered the question, I have no doubt that the Conservative majority would be even larger.

I read a recent debate held in another place on its own future. It was incredibly smug and self-satisfied and, in the light of the figures that I have just cited, I find it staggering that one peer could say, "Your Lordships' House stands as an independent bulwark"—

Madam Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman quoting from the current Session? If so, I remind him that that is not allowed and that he must paraphrase.

Mr. Grocott: I am paraphrasing, Madam Speaker. The noble Lord said in effect that the House of Lords was an independent bulwark against extremism at either end of the political spectrum.

I do not want to make this a party political issue so I shall now quote Winston Churchill who, when talking about the hereditary peerage in the early part of the century, described the House of Lords as > "one-sided, hereditary, unpurged, unrepresentative, irresponsible, absentee . . . filled with old doddering peers, cute financial magnates, clever wire pullers and big brewers with bulbous noses."

I do not agree about the bulbous noses, but I think that we can all understand his drift. He was speaking at the beginning of the century, but the social composition of the House of Lords has not changed that much.

According to the latest figures that I have seen, 60 per cent. of hereditary peers were described as farmers and landowners, 15 per cent. as industrialists and 12 per cent. as being involved in banking, finance and insurance. Even so—I again paraphrase a debate held the other day in the House of Lords—one peer in effect said without any hint of vanity or complacency that it was right to acknowledge that diversity was their greatest strength.

My simple proposition is that in a democracy it is ludicrous for people to inherit the right to legislate, and I am sure that the Bill will have all-party support. In fact, one of the inspirations for my presenting the Bill was the Prime Minister's rallying call for a classless society. I have not been able to check whether he will support the Bill, but, in the light of his known position on a classless society, I think that he should be behind me on this matter.

Should there still be any waverers among the Tories, let me put to them a simple proposition. If, in the Russia of today, for example, there were a Baron Trotsky, a Viscount Stalin or a Lord Lenin, the Tories would rightly be saying that in a democracy it was ludicrous that people should inherit titles, and we would say the same if there were descendants of Bismarck in the German Parliament or descendants of Napoleon in the French Parliament. However, there is a more urgent reason for dealing with the problem, and quickly.

There is a growing trend, which I welcome, for Members of Parliament to act as observers of elections abroad to ascertain whether voting systems are democratic. Of course, we can send people from the House of Lords.

[Mr. Grocott]

Have people queuing outside polling stations in hot African countries ever been questioned by a duke, marquess, earl or viscount about how well their system was operating? If I were in such a queue, my response would be, "Physician, heal thyself."

The democratic rights of the House of Commons have been fought for and they are precious. Your symbolic struggle, Madam Speaker, to be the Speaker of the House is symptomatic of the struggle of democratic power against hereditary power and you, perhaps more than anyone else, are the symbol of that. There are more hereditary peers in Parliament than democratically elected Members of this House. Their right to vote and to legislate for the people whom we represent would be laughable were it not so serious. It is indefensible in a democracy. It requires a simple Act of Parliament to put it right, a step that no one who cares about democracy could oppose. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bruce Grocott, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Peter Kilfoyle, Mr. George Foulkes, Ms Kate Hoey, Mr. George Howarth, Mr. John Hutton, Mr. Chris Mullin, Mr. Ken Purchase, Mr. Jeff Rooker and Mr. Ernie Ross.

Hereditary Peers (Democratic Rights)

Mr. Bruce Grocott accordingly presented a Bill to abolish the right of hereditary peers and peeresses to sit in the House of Lords; to establish their right to vote in general elections and to stand for election to the House of Commons; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 15 July, and to be printed. [Bill 127.]

Orders of the Day

Local Government (Wales) Bill [Lords].

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ordered,

That the Local Government (Wales) Bill [Lords], as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, New Clause 2, New Clause 11, New Clause 1, government New Clauses, remaining New Clauses, amendments to Clauses and amendments to Schedules.—[Mr. Redwood.]

New clause 2

Transfer of communities

'Where a community meeting under the 1972 Act resolves that that community should be transferred from the local government area in which it is situated by virtue of this Act to another such area, being an area contiguous with the community, then, provided that no fewer than one half of the local government electors in the community have voted for that resolution, the Secretary of State shall by order amend Schedule 1 to this Act to give effect to that resolution.'.—[Dr. Marek.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.45 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following: New clause 11—Referendum on boundaries (No. 2)—

'(1) If, by resolution, the council of any district existing at the time this Act receives Royal Assent so requests, the Secretary of State shall, before appointing a day for the coming into force of Section 1 of and Schedule 1 to this Act, prepare a scheme for the conduct of a referendum to be held within the area of any such district council.

(2) A referendum under subsection (1) above shall be for the purpose of determining whether the local government electors of the district are satisfied with the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act so far as they affect the boundaries of any local government area for which they are electors.

(3) Where it appears to the Secretary of State from the result of any referendum held under subsection (1) above that a majority of the electors of any district do not approve of any change in boundaries affecting that district which would result from the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act, he may by order made by statutory instrument make any modification to that Schedule which he considers will reflect the result of the referendum; and any such order shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament and be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House.'.

Amendment No. 117, in schedule 1, page 52, line 17, column 2, leave out from 'Cardiff' to end of line 19.

Amendment No. 28, in page 53, line 27, column 2,, leave out from 'Ogwr' to end of line 29.

Amendment No. 35, in page 53, line 34, column 1, leave out 'and Port Talbot'.

Amendment No. 36, in page 53, line 34, column 2, leave out 'and Port Talbot'.

Amendment No. 37, in page 53, line 35, leave out 'a Phort Talbot'.

Amendment No. 116, in page 54, line 1, at end insert:—

'Port Talbot Port Talbot.'.	The district of Port Talbot

Amendment No. 100, in page 54, line 2, leave out 'Rhondda,' in both places where it occurs.

Amendment No. 101, in page 54, line 3, leave out 'Rhondda,'.

Amendment No. 39, in page 54, line 3, leave out from 'Cynon' to end of line 5.

Amendment No. 40, in page 54, line 5, at end insert—

'Taff Ely Taf Eli'.	The district of Taff Ely.

Amendment No. 102, in page 54, line 6, at end insert—

Amendment No. 29, in page 54, line 9, column 2,, leave out lines 9 to 11.

Dr. Marek: We spent many hours in Committee on the Bill where it was accepted that the issues that caused probably most division, not necessarily across parties, but from one hon. Member to another, were over what to do with communities on the boundaries of the new unitary authorities and whether any particular community or area should be in one of the new unitary authorities or in another. In particular, I remember many hours talking about Llanelly Hill. I am not exactly sure where it is, but it is somewhere on the border of the present borough of Torfaen, the district of Monmouth and the district of Brecon.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Blaenau Gwent.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend corrects me. There was a case for including Llanelly Hill in any of those three new districts. Unfortunately, the Government decided that Llanelly Hill was to be in one of the those districts and, in spite of pleas by Labour and Conservative Members, there did not appear to be any movement in the position of the Minister or the Government in considering that, perhaps, Llanelly Hill could be part of another district or another unitary authority than the one to which the Government had allocated it.

Equally, one of the amendments that I tabled in Committee concerned the community of Llangollen. Certainly, a clear majority of people in Llangollen wished to be associated with, and be part of, Wrexham unitary authority. However, the Government decided that Llangollen was to be put in the Denbighshire authority and, in spite of cogent arguments, nothing seems to have changed the Government's mind.

Mr. Llew Smith: May I clarify one point? The Minister said that the Government would go away and think about the Llanelly community and consider the possibility of its being put into Monmouth or, indeed, into Blaenau Gwent. We proved that it was nonsense to keep it in Powys because we worked out that to attend two council meetings, it would take councillors approximately six days because it would require an overnight stay. The Ministers said that they would report back on that issue.

Dr. Marek: We shall have to wait and see exactly what the Ministers say, but I have not noticed that any appropriate amendment has been tabled to accede to the wishes of the Committee. It is true that the Minister said that representations could be made to a local government boundary commission about Llangollen in due course, but I should have thought that it is incumbent on us to get it right now.

Other communities are affected. Llansantffraid-ym-Mochnant, for example, which is currently part of Clwyd, could be regarded as part of a future Powys, but it is not entirely clear. My point is a precise one. The elected representatives of the community council or the district cannot necessarily speak unequivocally for their electors and for their citizens without taking the voices of those citizens and those electors into account.

I will not dwell on new clause 11 which is grouped with new clause 2. However, new clause 11, which I will support in due course, allows for a referendum to be held in a council area. New clause 2 allows for a community council meeting to be held. If more than half the people covered by the community council agree that that community should not be part of the proposals as set out by the Government and that it should perhaps join a coterminous authority, the Secretary of State should take notice of that and introduce an appropriate statutory instrument. In that respect, new clause 2 would be very useful.

Why have the Government been so intransigent about some of the authorities? There have been arguments about whether Meirionnydd should be separate from Caernarfon, but all the arguments met intransigence from the Government. Even though the Government were outvoted on the question of the break up of Powys, I have heard nothing from the Government Front Bench about letting the people decide on the issue.

It is symptomatic of this Government that we have government by diktat. Huge majorities for 12 or 13 years lead to that. The situation has now changed and the Government have time to make amends. I have received much correspondence about Llangollen, which is not in my constituency, but in the constituency of my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), who hopes to catch your eye later today or tomorrow, Madam Speaker. However, as I stated in Committee, I have full permission and authorisation to make these comments on behalf of the people of Llangollen.

The important point is that people should be allowed to choose. Llangollen is a long way away and removed from the rest of Denbighshire. It is over two mountain passes and the road is often closed in winter. It is very likely that the headquarters of the Denbighshire authority will be at Rhyl which may be 40 or 50 miles away, while Wrexham is only nine miles away.

When I made those points in Committee, the Minister of State said:

> "It will not have escaped the attention of the Committee that occasionally we come across a town that has some real attachments but is anxious to extend its boundaries further. This is especially so in the case of Wrexham."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 21 April 1994; c. 155.]

I do not think that it is. The case stands or falls because of the wishes of the people of Llangollen, not because of the wishes of the people of Wrexham. Equally, the case in Llanelly Hill stands or falls because of the wishes of the people in Llanelly Hill, not because of the wishes of anyone else anywhere, even of people here. We should listen to what the people have to say.

[Dr. Marek]

Clearly, if more than half a community's citizens attend a community council meeting and they express a wish, that should be listened to, even by this Government.

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): While I accept the force of the hon. Gentleman's argument, does he accept that in the case of Llanelly Hill, there has indeed been a referendum which was in favour of Monmouthshire? It would appear from amendment No. 77 that the Government now recognise the full force of that referendum.

Hon. Members: What about elsewhere?

Dr. Marek: I welcome what the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) has said. If the Government have recognised it, that is excellent and I congratulate the Government on that. However, as many of my hon. Friends have said from a sedentary position, what about elsewhere?

Mr. Llew Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that an opinion survey was carried out and the vast majority of people expressed a wish to be part of the Blaenau Gwent community as opposed to Monmouth? Does he also recognise that in the referendum referred to by the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) it was no surprise that people voted to be part of Monmouth because there was no suggestion or policy at that particular time for a borough of Blaenau Gwent? We were still talking about the Heads of the Valleys authority.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend also makes the point that we now have firm proposals in front of us. The wisest course of events, when there was a dispute in those five or six areas in the Principality, would be for the issue to be decided after listening to the people. A referendum or a community meeting would be the most appropriate way of proceeding. On the Llangollen issue, there was also a referendum in which 58 per cent. voted in favour of joining Wrexham and only 42 per cent.—that is according to the Minister; the figures are rounded down—voted to stay with Denbighshire. That is not a good advertisement for good government. A clear majority favour joining Wrexham. However, I want to make progress as we are to have two very short debates.

I have had many telephone calls and letters of support for my stance in Committee on Llangollen being part of the new Wrexham unitary authority. It clearly makes sense because of geography, ties, shopping, the location of the hospital and other services, as well as bus routes. Above all, it makes sense because the people want it. If the Government listened to that they would be able to accept new clause 2.

I must say that I have had two letters of complaint, one from the chief executive of Glyndwr district council, Mr. Julian Parry. Quite honestly, he wrote a rather stupid letter pointing out so-called inaccuracies in what I said in Committee. I was told, for example, that I got the year wrong—it was 1992 instead of 1993—and that it is not yet absolutely clear that the new Denbighshire authority will have Rhyl as its centre. If it is not clear to him, I wonder why he is being paid so much per annum by the council tax payers of Glyndwr. He is the only one who has written to me objecting to Llangollen joining Wrexham.The only other person who complained was the clerk of Llantysilio council.

Such people are not elected. I suspect that most community councillors in Llantysilio have never faced an election in their lives. They are quite happy to make decisions and write letters to the Secretary of State for Wales saying, "We believe this and we believe that," but they do not have the backing of the people; they are unrepresentative. Why do they not join me and organise a referendum now that we know all the facts? They should allow the people to decide the issue.

This matter is not confined to a party political argument. Perhaps the Conservative party is trying to gerrymander boundaries for electoral advantage, but I do not think that it is. In most cases, it has just got it wrong.

I have a letter—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) will comment on this matter—from Mr. David Unwin, the Conservative leader of Ogwr borough council. The Conservatives are up in arms over the fact that the Ewenny and St. Brides Major area is to be taken from Bridgend and given to the Vale of Glamorgan. Councillor David Unwin says:

> "Before it is too late, I urge you all to redouble your efforts on our behalf in an attempt to get a last minute change of heart by the Welsh Office Ministers over this issue."

He makes a

> "plea for some common sense and fair play for these communities who have no wish to be torn away from a council"—

Bridgend or Ogwr—

> "based centrally in nearby Bridgend."

It is not a party political issue; it cuts across parties. We would have worse government if we considered it to be a party political issue.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Marek: I shall certainly give way, but I am coming to the end of my remarks.

Mr. Evans: I have been listening carefully to the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument and I wonder whether he can help me with one part of the new clause. He will have gathered from the intervention of his hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) that sometimes, even when referendums are held, a decision is not acceptable if it does not happen to be the one with which one agrees. As we found during the debate on the Welsh devolution referendum, some people will never accept the result of a referendum. In the new clause, the hon. Gentleman is permitting every community in Wales to continue to vote on where they should be for local government purposes ad infinitum. There is no cut-off point. It would seem that local communities could therefore face endless referendums on the question of which local government area they should be in. Why has the hon. Gentleman not included a time limit in new clause 2?

Dr. Marek: First, the hon. Gentleman has introduced a red herring with regard to devolution. We shall discuss that matter in the debate on the next group of amendments.

Secondly, let us talk about coterminous communities. Communities can only be coterminous communities. I freely admit that I did not have the assistance of parliamentary data when I drafted the new clause. I could have included a limit of six months or something like that —it sounds like a sensible idea—but I did not think of it at the time. I believe in the good sense of community councils and the people of Wales and I do not foresee the type of scenario that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) has drawn to the attention of the House.

There are five or six areas where communities feel deeply disgruntled that the Government have got it wrong and they should be in a different authority from the one that they are in but coterminous to it. New clause 2 is an attempt to put the matter right; new clause 11 is a better attempt to put it right. Certainly, as far as communities are concerned, it is sensible. The argument is not that if it goes against the way that I want it to go, I will not agree with it. My argument is that it is up to the people who live in these areas—Llanelly Hill, Llangollen and Llansantffraid-ym-Mochnant—to make the decision; it is not for me to say. In new clause 2, I am seeking to give them the chance, and I hope that the House will be able to agree to it.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I shall seek to call a Division on new clause 11 at the appropriate time in our proceedings.

I am sure that the House will join me in wishing the Secretary of State for Wales a happy birthday. In the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee this morning, we discovered that the Secretary of State is enjoying his birthday today. I assure him that he receives the warmest wishes from all of us on this side of the House. When I say, "All of us," I am not sure whether the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) would wish to join in our felicitations, given the exchange that took place between the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Secretary of State this morning.

We offer the Secretary of State sincere many happy returns for today. I am sure that our wishes are more sincere than those of the Prime Minister, who probably looks at the record of the Secretary of State and hopes that he can get rid of him fairly quickly. It is fair to say that the Labour party's fondness for the Secretary of State is much greater than that of his colleagues in the Tory party because he has done much more for the Labour party in Wales than he has for the Tory party.

The Tory party now enjoys a record low in the polls in Wales. In the local elections earlier this year, it managed what the Prime Minister would probably call a significant achievement in winning one out of the 54 district council seats that were up for election. Last week in the European elections, the Tory party's share of the popular vote fell to less than 15 per cent. It suffered the indignity of coming third behind the Welsh nationalist party and, of course, it did not win one European seat in Wales.

The people of Wales can thank the Secretary of State for at least doing his part to ensure that Wales is represented by five excellent Members of the European Parliament, all of whom have substantial majorities. One of them enjoys the distinction of being the youngest MEP and another, Glenys Kinnock, enjoys the distinction—

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I fail to see what the hon. Gentleman's contribution has to do with this debate. I appreciate the fact that this will be his last contribution in the House before the new leader of the Labour party removes him and brings in the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), but I do not see what it has to do with new clause 11.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has a point; I was wondering what it had to do with the new clause. Now that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has finished his preamble, perhaps he will move on to the new clause.

Mr. Davies: As usual, the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) pre-empted me. I was about to refer directly to the fact that the Government suffered such a defeat because of the contempt in which they held the democratic process in Wales.

If new clause 11 is accepted, it will put at the heart of the Bill the opportunity for the people of Wales and the elected authorities to take control of their future. New clause 11 allows an existing district council to require a referendum by a simple resolution. A council could require the Secretary of State to convene a referendum on whether people were happy with the proposals in the Bill.

It is worth considering the fact that this reorganisation of local government was supposedly introduced by consent. When the Secretary of State's predecessor introduced his consultative document he talked about the need for consent; when the White Paper was introduced he mentioned the need for consent; and whenever the Secretary of State and his predecessors introduce any measure or statement in the House they talk about the need for consent. We can now see that consent is the very last thing that the Government have for this reorganisation of local government.

The Government also said that they wanted to use district councils as building blocks. Following our deliberations in Committee, it is now clear that that concept was put out of the window at a fairly early stage. New clause 11 would allow district councils to reassert themselves, to give a view and, we hope, require the Secretary of State to take a much more considered and meaningful view of the wishes of local government in Wales.

Any objective reading of our proceedings in Committee would persuade one to recognise that Opposition Members exposed widespread opposition to the proposals by not only local authorities and Members of Parliament but the public and many of our Welsh institutions, both private and public. In addition, we exposed the very deep resentment in some Welsh communities at the Government's deliberate and flagrant attempt at gerrymandering political boundaries for the sole purpose of influencing the results at the next general election to the advantage of the Conservative party.

We are also clear about the fact that communities such as Neath, Port Talbot, Rhondda, Cynon and Taff Ely were dissatisfied with the proposals. Many of my hon. Friends will want to refer to their local authorities. I shall not speak at length on that subject, but I must briefly mention the attempt at gerrymandering.

In Committee, there was much debate about Llanelly Hill. My hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) speculated that the Bill was not a local government reorganisation, but a Llanelly Hill reorganisation because we debated it so much. The Government were clearly exposed as using the people of Llanelly Hill as political pawns. New clause 11 would give the district council within which they reside—the borough represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith), who is especially anxious to represent the views of those residents—the opportunity to require a proper referendum.

I accept the point raised by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) in an intervention. Of course, the referendum was unsatisfactory, because there was no prior consultation and the Secretary of State did not attempt to tell the people of Llanelly Hill that he had any intention of removing them from Blaenau Gwent and putting them in Powys or Monmouthshire. Now we have a compromise. In the face of the onslaught by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent when he made his case, the Government clearly could not sustain the argument for putting them in Powys, so the Government have conceded and put them in Monmouthshire. The important principle running through all the Opposition speeches is that there ought to be consistency in dealings with communities, which should have the opportunity to decide their future.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) moved the motion, he referred to Ogwr borough council, which was another subject that detained us in Committee. I, too, received a copy of the letter from Councillor David Unwin. I shall read one or two paragraphs from it, as it demonstrates the utter contempt with which the Government's attempt at gerrymandering has been viewed. He writes:

> "You will already be fully aware of the intense feelings of bitterness and anger that continue to exist within the three communities of St. Bride's Major, Ewenny and Wick in Mid Glamorgan against the current Government proposals to move them away from the new Bridgend Unitary Authority and into the Vale of Glamorgan Unitary Authority.
> The local people resent this very much indeed! . . . I am currently Chairman of one of those councils, apart from my other role as Conservative Opposition Leader on Ogwr Borough Council . . . I have lived in my community for the past 25 years and I know only too well what the local people are thinking on this issue . . . My colleagues, Councillor Audrey Preston (Conservative) who represents St. Bride's Major and Wick . . . and also Councillor John Lewis, (Conservative) who represents Ewenny . . . both join with me in this plea".

We have the clearest possible demonstration of the welter of public opinion, expressed by elected representatives, the referendum held in Bridgend, Members of Parliament, letters and public consultation. All those organisations have roundly condemned the Government, yet the Government have a forlorn belief that somehow they will save the political skin of the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) by shifting a couple of hundred votes across. It is a most contemptible attempt at a political fix and has been resented even by the people whose political interest is supposed to be represented by the attempt. It is disgraceful, and our attempt to introduce new clause 11 will give the people in that community an opportunity to ensure that they have fair play.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) has fought vigorously not only for the independence of Taff Ely but to ensure that there is no gerrymandering there. We can see what has happened at Pentyrch. I refer the Secretary of State and hon. Members to a report in the Pontypridd and Llantrisant Observer on 2 June. The report said:

> "A leading Taff Ely councillor has resigned from the Conservative party in protest at Government policy. Former mayor Jean Henderson, who has represented Pentyrch since 1979, said her decision was prompted by plans to merge Taff Ely . . . 'I really think that the Government has behaved very insensitively,' she said . . . She also attacked plans to place Pentyrch under Cardiff's control. 'I really do think it's because the Government wants to add a few more Conservative voters to Cardiff,' she said."

That is the motivation behind the construction of these boundaries. It was exposed in Committee, has been resented by the public and has been attacked by the Government's political allies. New clause 11 would expose that attempt at gerrymandering and give the people of those communities the opportunity to right that wrong.

We had some debate in Committee on Powys and there was a lot of controversy about the wishes of the people of Powys and the three district councils of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire and Breconshire. The Government were defeated, of course. Much of the consideration in the early part of the debate was about Powys, but the Government were defeated on the proposal to have Powys as a unitary authority.

It is now clear from the amendment paper that the Government are determined to ignore the wishes of the Committee and of the three district councils and to reinsert that proposal for Powys in the Bill. I want to make it clear that I support the proposals that came from the Committee, and if the measure comes to a vote I shall vote in favour of it. My colleagues and I have consistently said that we will support the case of Montgomery. We did that in Committee and we also said that we would consistently support the case for Brecon and Radnor as independent authorities. We also applied that principle to the borough councils of Rhondda, Taff Ely, Llanelli, Port Talbot and Neath.

On every occasion, we challenged the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor to show the same consistency we had shown. If there was a disgraceful event in that Committee, it was when the hon. Gentleman, having seduced—I use the word advisedly—the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) into supporting him, and knowing that he had the support of Labour Members, quite deliberately, at the very next sitting of the Committee, betrayed the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and refused to vote for that authority. That reflects poorly on the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor.

We stated clearly that the Labour party was in favour of the principle of consent. We wanted reorganisation. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) did not take part in our proceedings in Committee. I shall not remind him of what happened to his predecessor, the Whip on that Committee, but I should be happy to discuss with him why that Whip left the Committee. I suggest that he have a word with his Minister, who I am sure will advise him to restrain himself. The Labour party wanted reorganisation to take place with the consent, and according to the wishes, of the people. That is what new clause 11 will achieve.

4.15 pm

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor failed to persuade the Government of the merits of his own case for an independent Brecon and Radnor. He failed to convince the majority of his colleagues to join him in defeating the Government. He failed to follow the principles that he had argued that we should follow in carving up Powys, because he did not follow those same principles when we voted on Rhondda and Port Talbot. He also failed to reciprocate the vote of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy —not that there was any binding agreement between them. He failed to vote with those of us in the Committee who wanted to defeat the proposals for area committees, although he knew that, if we had defeated that proposal, the Government would have had to accept our proposal to dismember Powys unitary authority.

If the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor finds that he is defeated tonight, as I am sure that he will be, he has no one to blame but himself. He is the architect of his own defeat. Had he shown any consistency or principle, he would have found that he and colleagues could force the Government to accept the logic of the case not only for Brecon and Radnor but for Montgomery and Meirionnydd. I hope that the electors of Brecon and Radnor will repay the hon. Member, come the next general election.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I am flattered that the hon. Gentleman has chosen to devote so much of his speech to my personal position. He aspires to be Secretary of State for Wales. Earlier today, he had a meeting with the leaders of Montgomeryshire council, Breconshire council and Radnorshire council. He heard their pleas in relation to the position he has taken—a shabby position, if I may say so —in this debate. If he truly aspires to be a proper Secretary of State for Wales, will he say what his response was to those leaders?

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman asked why I have spent so much time on him. The simple reason is that he has spent most of today briefing the press and has tried to pretend that his failure to defend his own interests in Brecon and Radnor has been caused by the Labour party. Somehow, 265 of us are supposed to gallop to the defence of the single vote from the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor. That is a most odd proposition.

It is true that I met representatives of those three district councils. I explained clearly that if there were any prospect of their securing the objective of separate unitary authorities for their councils, it lay in new clause 11. The Labour party is united on that new clause. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor knows that we have asked all our colleagues to join us in the Lobby to vote in favour of it. The new clause represents a matter of principle for the Labour party, although the hon. Gentleman may not recognise that.

I understand that representatives of the Liberal party and of Plaid Cymru, the nationalist party, will also join us in the Lobby. The Opposition parties will be united tonight. That unity demonstrates the way in which we have all been, if I may speak for all the Opposition parties, absolutely consistent in our treatment of local authorities, be they Labour authorities in south Wales, Liberal or Tory authorities in mid-Wales or Plaid Cymru or independent party authorities in north Wales. We have applied the same principle to all of them.

There is a realistic chance of new clause 11 being carried tonight. It will require the courage of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor in voting with us and his diligence in persuading some of his colleagues to join him. If he does that and new clause 11 is carried, it will be a decisive boost for better local government in Wales. It will give a democratic choice to people who live in Montgomery and Meirionnydd and to communities such as Port Talbot and Caerphilly. It will also be an object lesson to the Government of the dangers that arise from their arrogant abuse of power. I hope that new clause 11 is carried.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I suspect that a more direct answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) would have been that it is not for Opposition parties to produce legislation that represents an acceptable consensus for the people of Wales. It is for the Government to produce legislation that is correct and represents a consensus acceptable to the population. The Government have failed to do that because the decision-making process that has led to the Bill in its present form, as it will probably be glossed by the amendments that are carried tonight, has been severely deficient.

Had the referendum proposals been in place, the Government would have known exactly what the public felt in areas where Ministers know that there is passionate feeling about the future of local government and the community of which that local government has been a symbol for many centuries, as in areas such as Montgomeryshire.

An advantage of a statutory referendum procedure as set out in new clause 11 is that it would be not the type of referendum that has been criticised in the "foreplay" to the Bill but a referendum conducted under objective rules made by the Government. The Government would have an opportunity to present their case to the people of the districts concerned and opposition to their proposals could also be voiced. A referendum would provide the Government with an informed decision by the population of districts such as Montgomeryshire and they could then decide, on the basis of that informed decision, whether it was right to proceed with their initial proposals.

It would be a much better form of decision making than we have had. May I compare the influence on decisions which a referendum can have with the decision-making process in relation to the Bill?

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that the Bill as it emerged from Committee contains a proposal for a Montgomeryshire authority which he and I supported. That much is certain. The measure that he now says he intends to support proposes merely a consultative referendum. Is that to be preferred to what is currently in the Bill?

Mr. Carlile: Of course not. Had such a referendum been available, we would probably never have reached the proposals in the White Paper because the Government would have understood that they were wholly unacceptable. I do not want to repeat what has been said on many occasions, except for a few sentences. Within my constituency of Montgomeryshire, there is an overwhelming and passionate objection to the way in which the Government have ridden crudely roughshod over the views of my constituents.

The anger felt in Montgomeryshire is reflected not just in the district council. Hundreds of people have written to me and a fair number have written to the Secretary of State. Representations made to Ministers have been courteously received, particularly by the Minister of State. Overwhelming expressions of opinion made through an opinion poll and a petition have shown beyond doubt that the decision-making process adopted by the Government simply did not produce a result that was representative of the public's views. If we had at least consultative referendums under a statutory procedure, how much more reliable the Government's basis for legislation would be.

Let us compare a referendum with what has happened. I should like to run through the chronology for a few moments.

Mr. Roger Evans: I am aware of the force of the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument and I appreciate that that might apply to Llanelli Hill, Ewenny or Wick. As I understand the force of his argument, he wants a separate Montgomeryshire authority. Does he agree that the wording of new clause 11 is such that there can be a referendum on the provisions only

> "so far as they affect the boundaries of any local government area", so there is no consolation or aim for his purpose in new clause 11, whatever other arguments he may have?

Mr. Carlile: I did not draft new clause 11, but my understanding of it is that it does cover the point that I seek to make, and it seems to me to have been carefully drafted to answer the hon. Gentleman's argument.

I shall turn to the chronology for a few moments. On 3 March 1992, the right hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), the then Secretary of State for Wales, made a statement in the House and issued a consultation paper. There had not been a referendum; had he held a referendum he would have found, unusually for his party, that he had virtually 100 per cent. support in my part of Wales at least. He said:

> "In the rural areas I want to see local government based on the traditional counties, such as Pembrokeshire, Montgomeryshire, Cardiganshire and Anglesey and, of course, we recognise the position of Meirionnyddshire and Carmarthenshire. I shall consult further on whether to extend that approach to separate authorities for Radnorshire and Brecknock."—[Official Report, 3 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 171.]

At that stage, therefore, the then Secretary of State was going to have, among others, a separate Montgomeryshire and a separate Meirionnyddshire. That was clearly stated.

That was confirmed a short time later in a written answer to the then Member for Delyn, Mr. Raffan, who, I believe, has departed these shores to a more prosperous life across the Atlantic. The Secretary of State was asked to estimate how much money would be saved by moving to unitary local government in Wales. He replied:

> "My proposal for a structure of 23 unitary authorities is estimated to be cost neutral; I am placing in the Library of the House and in the Vote Office copies of the report submitted to me by financial consultants."—[Official Report, 16 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 904.]

At that stage therefore, in spite of everything that has been said since about its being more expensive to have smaller unitary authorities, the then Secretary of State was saying that he was going to have 23 unitary authorities, which included Meirionnyddshire and Montgomeryshire. It was even accepted at that time that it was value for money. There was no need for a referendum at that stage because he would have had 100 per cent. support.

Then we reached the 1992 general election. There was a frisson of anxiety among the Liberal Democrats in Montgomeryshire as David Hunt, at that time not a Member of Parliament but merely a candidate although still Secretary of State for Wales, came to Llanfechain and made a promise—a pledge—that Montgomeryshire would be a unitary authority. There was no need for a referendum because we were having a general election. The Secretary of State at the time would not have said it if he did not think that it would win him votes. That was one of the purposes in saying it, although it is my view that the then Secretary of State meant every word he said, and has always meant every word he said on that subject, and I acquit him of any duplicity on the issue.

Let us turn for a moment to the answer that was given in Committee in relation to the Llanfechain promise by the current Under-Secretary of State. He sought to present, on behalf of the—by then—former Secretary of State what appears to have been a plea in mitigation. I suspect that plea was not written by the former Secretary of State. The Under-Secretary said:

> "My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State has confirmed that his statements, which were made in a pre-election meeting, have been taken out of context. He did not pledge the Government to a Montgomeryshire unitary authority."

4.30 pm

At least if we had had a referendum, there would have been some record of the pledges and of their context. The context, of course, was a vote-winning meeting in a village called Llanfechain, and there was no possible contextual ambiguity about what the right hon. Member for Wirral, West said. The Under-Secretary continued:

> "Rather, he was looking forward to considering that on the basis of the proposals which he had already published from the Welsh Office or stated in the House. That was the position in 1992. There has been further consideration of the issues since then, especially those in the context of the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance. The Government have been convinced that Montgomeryshire was too small and that a Powys authority was in the best interests of local government and service delivery."

I put it to the Minister that what he said in Standing Committee was simply inaccurate and that the Secretary of State in 1992 meant every word he said. It is time that we heard from a Minister the real reasons why the Government have ratted—why they have gone weasel on their words. It is time that we heard the truth.

In revealing the real truth—I shall reveal it to the House in the next few moments—we shall see the difference between that truth and the way in which this matter would have been decided had there been a local referendum.

On 14 April 1992, a significant event took place which I am sure that the Secretary of State will recall. That was the day the current Secretary of State for Wales was appointed Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities at the Department of the Environment. He became the Minister who most closely influenced discussions and decision making in relation to local government reform in England. Of course, we all know that our elective dictatorship, in the form of the Secretary of State for Wales, is somewhat diluted by the fact that many of the shots are called not in Cardiff or in Gwydyr house but in lead Departments in England. This is where we begin to see the insidious effect of the lead Department in England, which, to the relevant extent, was thenceforth led by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

Then, in September 1992, the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance met. It was referred to by the Under-Secretary in Standing Committee on 19 April this year, when he said:

> "There has been further consideration of the issues since then, especially in the context of the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A; 19 April 1994, c.105.]

In September 1992, the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance met and discussed the structures group work on service delivery. Following that meeting, Meirionnydd and Montgomery remained unitary authorities in the plans of Welsh Office Ministers.

It is worth contrasting this shabby decision-making process with some questions that I tabled which were "answered" by the Secretary of State earlier this year. On 10 May, I asked him:

> "on what date his predecessor sent the draft White Paper, 'Local Government in Wales—a Charter for the Future', to other members of the Cabinet seeking their agreement to its publication".

The right hon. Gentleman answered:

> "It is not the practice to give details of internal discussions on policy formulation."—[Official Report, 10 May 1994; Vol. 243, c. 107.]

On 16 May, I asked on what date the Government decided that the White Paper on local government in Wales should not contain proposals for unitary authorities for Meirionnydd and Montgomeryshire. The right hon. Gentleman answered—on behalf of this open Government:

> "It is not the practice to give details of internal discussions on policy matters.—[Official Report, 16 May 1994; Vol. 243, c. 351.]

One had to ask oneself, why, oh why, did this open Government, who believe in revealing the decision-making processes, decide not to tell when they changed their mind about whether there should be unitary Meirionnyddshire and Montgomeryshire?

I turn now to some interesting information which, hitherto, was not in the public domain. It has been revealed to me by a source who plainly is very strongly against the outrageous decision-making process which we have suffered and which I continue to contrast with a process that would have included a referendum.

My source has revealed matters which I challenge the Secretary of State to confirm or deny. It is true—but it would be nice to hear it confirmed honestly from the Government Front Bench—that, on 18 December 1992, the then Secretary of State sent a minute to the Prime Minister and to other Ministers about his proposals for the White Paper. In effect, it was the draft White Paper. What did it contain? Reference to a unitary Montgomeryshire and Meirionnyddshire. December 1992 was close to the wire so far as the White Paper was concerned.

On 13 January 1993, a private secretary in the Prime Minister's office, Mary Francis, wrote a letter to a private secretary at the Welsh Office, Judith Simpson. Hitherto, that letter has not been in the public domain. I shall quote from it, as a part of its contents has been revealed to me. Perhaps the Secretary of State would like to check the authenticity of the letter. It reads:

> "Dear Judith"—

that part being in manuscript—

> "Local Government Re-organisation in Wales"
> "The Prime Minister was grateful for your Secretary of State's minute of 18 December. He welcomes the broad outline of his proposals. He has, however, expressed concern about the following points and I would be grateful if you would clarify the position on them:
> (i) the new authorities will cover populations ranging from 34,000 to 295,000."

Then the perfectly proper question is asked:

> "Is it feasible to expect such disparate areas to provide the same quality of service?"

The point about that extract is that the reference to populations ranging from 34,000 to 295,000 makes it absolutely clear that, on that date—13 January 1993—the Welsh Office was proposing, in its draft White Paper, a unitary Meirionnydd, a unitary Montgomery and, I believe, a unitary single Brecon and Radnor. If the Welsh Office had proposed a single Radnor, the range would have been smaller than 34,000 to 295,000. I am extremely grateful to whoever provided me with that information—I have no idea who it was—and for revealing to me what a dingy and vilely deceitful decision-making process, and I choose my words carefully, has been followed. I, and most of the people of Montgomeryshire, do not intend to pull any punches about what is happening to our county. We wish to contrast that process with what might have happened if we had had new clause 11 and a referendum procedure.

The White Paper was issued on 1 March 1993. At some point between 13 January—when the letter from which I quoted was written—and 1 March, Montgomeryshire and Meirionnyddshire were chopped. What happened and who made it happen? It is plain that Welsh Office Ministers were not responsible, because they were in favour of a unitary Montgomeryshire and a unitary Meirionnyddshire. It is also plain that the proposals went to the Department of the Environment—and equally plain that they would have been considered by the right hon. Member for Wokingham, then Minister for Local Government and Planning.

What was the Minister worried about? It follows as night follows day: if the matter were being considered by a jury, that jury would scream "Guilty" at the right hon. Gentleman. I can see it all. The message sent back to the then Secretary of State for Wales was, "We cannot have little authorities like this, or we shall end up with Rutlandshire, Huntingdonshire and such places as Clackmannanshire in Scotland." What have we now? We have Rutlandshire in England—the Government had to give way on that; we have Huntingdonshire in England, which was recommended because the Prime Minister represents the area; we have Clackmannanshire in Scotland. For some reason, however, the Welsh Office remains intransigent. One wonders why—for, by the time that the White Paper was produced, Montgomeryshire and Meirionnyddshire had gone.

Analysis of the statement made in the House by the then Secretary of State on 1 March 1993—the day of the White Paper's publication—makes it clear that the right hon. Gentleman was pretty embarrassed by what he had to present in the way of proposals for mid-Wales.

What happened next? On 27 May 1993, the right hon. Member for Wokingham was promoted to the post of Secretary of State for Wales. I have chosen my words carefully, and I am sorry if the Secretary of State took offence when I spoilt a moment of his birthday, as he seemed to suggest this morning. It is clear that by the time that the Secretary of State arrived at the Welsh Office, Montgomeryshire's and Meirionnyddshire's prospects of becoming unitary authorities were nil, because the right hon. Gentleman was actuated by bias against small unitary authorities.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. John Redwood): I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will withdraw all those scandalous allegations, for which he has not a shred of evidence. If he wants to know what my views were when I was Minister for Local Government and Planning, he need only turn up my speech to the Conservative party conference in the autumn of 1992, which is a matter of public record. It made my position very clear—and it was very different from that which he described.

Mr. Carlile: Then why did the Secretary of State not answer my questions on 10 May and 16 May, reported in Hansard at columns 107 and 351 respectively? What does he say about the letter from which I quoted, which has been leaked from some Department or other? What does he say about when the decision was changed? Will he tell us who changed it? If he is not the guilty party, he should let the people of mid-Wales—the people of Montgomeryshire and Meirionnyddshire—know who the guilty party is. It is disgraceful that the Government should hide behind such shabby subterfuges, especially as we now have Rutlandshire, Huntingdonshire and, I believe, six other English authorities that are smaller than Montgomeryshire, as well as Clackmannanshire.

It is noteworthy that, in his speech about the Bill in another place on 17 January—reported in column 364—Lord Rodger carefully avoided giving the Government's opinion. Every time he referred to Meirionnydd, in particular, he used the words "the Secretary of State" rather than "the Government"—"the Secretary of State" had justified the change in the decision. That was a very interesting and careful use of words by a distinguished and cautious lawyer, and I think that those words bear close examination.

I shall withdraw my earlier words, with one proviso: the Secretary of State must recognise that the decision-making process has been severely defective and that he has gone against the will of the people of central Wales and Meirionnyddshire, and must agree to unitary authorities for Montgomeryshire and Meirionnyddshire. I shall withdraw my words then, and not until then.

Until we have a better decision-making process, including statutory referendums, we shall be faced time and time again with similar disgraceful decisions by the elected dictatorship in the Welsh Office. Such decisions cause grave offence not only to Members of Parliament but to the very many members of the public whom we represent.

4.45 pm

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) again made the accusation that gerrymandering was behind the Government's policy in the Bill. The matter was addressed at length in Committee and I was sorry to hear the hon. Gentleman raise it yet again—particularly as the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) acknowledged that gerrymandering had probably not been the Government's objective.

I am obliged to bring a number of factors to the hon. Gentleman's attention once more. First, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) acknowledged in Committee, there is no obvious likelihood that the three villages of Wick, Ewenny and St Bride's Major will be added to the Vale of Glamorgan parliamentary constituency. The Vale of Glamorgan already has some 67,000 electors and is the largest constituency in Wales. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the average electorate of the 40 proposed new constituencies in Wales is about 55,500; adding a further 3,000-plus electors to the Vale of Glamorgan would make it wildly oversized. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West clearly understood that in Committee and it is a shame that such a simple message has not got through to the hon. Member for Caerphilly.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West realised the logical effect of the requirements under which the boundary commission works. If those villages had come into the Vale of Glamorgan unitary authority—in other words, if the Bill had been enacted by 1 June this year and the boundary commission had therefore based its recommendations on the revised county boundaries rather than the old ones—it is likely that, rather than those three communities being added to the Vale of Glamorgan constituency, the boundaries to both the west and the east of the Vale of Glamorgan unitary authority would have been taken into account. That would have resulted in an electorate of 88,000. Surely the hon. Member for Caerphilly did not seriously think that there would be the remotest possibility of a constituency of that size being established.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West was probably right to observe, although I cannot see into the minds of the politically independent members of the boundary commission, that one way to deal with the matter would be to create two new parliamentary seats in the Vale of Glamorgan. Whether the Bill had been passed before 1 June or, as now seems likely, some time next month, the hon. Member for Caerphilly was wrong in his suggestion and I hope that he will have the generosity to withdraw his comments.

Today, I received a letter from Mr. Jones, a constituent of the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), containing a copy of a letter that he sent to Birds Garden Centre, a well-known firm in the Vale of Glamorgan. He stated that, because he was so annoyed about the prospect of becoming an elector in the new unitary authority of the Vale of Glamorgan, he would withdraw his custom from Birds. That is the level at which the debate has been conducted in those three communities, which fear that somehow they could be prevented from continuing their normal association with Bridgend. Those three villages will remain just as proximate to Bridgend and, with or without the Bill, their residents will be just as capable of going shopping in Bridgend. The very fact that Mr. Jones was able to threaten to withdraw his trade from Birds shows the connection between those three villages and the rural vale.

People in those three villages live adjacent to villages in the existing Vale of Glamorgan and share common interests with them. The likelihood is that they will benefit from being in the Vale of Glamorgan because of the community of interest with the neighbouring rural communities.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): When the hon. Gentleman put those arguments to a public meeting at Brynteg comprehensive school in Bridgend, how many of the audience of between 175 and 200 voted with him?

Mr. Sweeney: I can answer that only by placing my answer in the context of the meeting, which was chaired by Mr. David Unwin, a member of the public who has already been referred to in the debate and who is vehemently opposed to the Bill. He is a leading member of the Conservative organisation in the Bridgend constituency. I expected him to chair the meeting in an unbiased manner.

The hon. Gentleman and I were officially invited to the meeting to present our views. Mr. Unwin opened it by making a half-hour speech opposing the three villages coming into the Vale of Glamorgan. The hon. Member for Bridgend then spoke for a similar time before I could get a word in edgeways.

That is the background to the vote, which was taken at the end of the meeting. The chairman first asked who was from the Vale of Glamorgan and they were not allowed to cast any vote. The fact that people voted against coming into the Vale of Glamorgan should be seen in that context.

Mr. Win Griffiths: How many?

Mr. Sweeney: I do not know how many people voted, but I accept that the people at the meeting were opposed to coming into the Vale. That is hardly surprising, given the context in which the discussion took place and the dismissiveness of one member of the audience when I said that people were likely to experience lower levels of council tax in the Vale of Glamorgan than if they remained in Bridgend and that they would have a shared community of interest with the neighbouring villages. Those arguments were ignored.

I strongly object to the allegations made by the hon. Member for Caerphilly and I hope that I have nailed his points once and for all.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I shall make some general remarks and then I shall be specific as I know that many of my hon. Friends want to speak.

We regretted the decision of the Secretary of State for Wales to break with tradition by insisting that the Committee did not consist solely of Welsh Members. For various reasons, many of us were unable to serve on the Committee that discussed the Bill and put our communities' case. On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) and others who could not sit on the Committee, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) for the able way in which he put our case.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly that it was appalling that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) advanced principled arguments in support of the position in Powys but voted against that proposition and the logical argument on the south Wales valleys. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly was right to expose him today for his unprincipled stand.

We may talk about principles, but there is one thing that I fail to understand about the Bill. It is patchwork quilt and it is inconsistent. During discussions, the previous Secretary of State asked us to present our opinions and then said that the Glamorgan valleys would be divided on a reasonable basis. Within a year, that was completely overturned. Even at this late stage, no good reasons have been presented for the structure that the Secretary of State proposes in the Bill. It is an inconsistent sham and a patchwork without any underlying principle.

The one principle that the Minister put forward was that the Bill would set up unitary authorities. I have served on district and county councils. Having seen how they operate and the way in which they provide services, I believe that there should be two-tier local government.

Since the publication of the Bill, my views have been justified. Its basic proposition relates to unitary authorities, but the Secretary of State says that unitary authorities are too small to carry out certain functions and that they have to form joint boards. Perhaps the only consistent argument that the Secretary of State advanced was that the Glamorgan valleys have a mini county council with a population of about 250,000 people. It will probably be the only authority in south Wales that will be able to deliver all services itself. Every other unitary authority will have a second, unelected tier. It would have been far better if the Secretary of State had retuned local government in Wales instead of setting up a false structure that has no relationship to an overall authority in Wales.

One problem for the Glamorgan valleys is that the Secretary of State has a "flat earth" mentality. He looks at the map and decides that Aberdare is only a couple of miles away from Maerdy, but fails to realise that there is a mountainous area between them. It is unbelievable that what we are debating will affect the delivery of intimate services. We shall be landed not with two-tier local government but with three-tier local government, and the area committees will mean even further divisions.

When I made my case to the Secretary of State, he said that Rhondda could be an area committee within the Glamorgan valleys system. That is completely inconsistent, especially from a person renowned for his logic and clear thinking. If that is an example of clear thinking in relation to the business of Wales, we are being very badly served. Rhondda communities are aggrieved, and rightly so. For almost as long as local government has existed in its present form, Rhondda has been a single authority. Even under the previous reorganisation, it was not linked with another authority. Its boundaries remained inviolate because it is a particular and peculiar unit in itself.

I am not arguing against my hon. Friends the Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith)—I congratulate them on having succeeded in making their case. However, if the arguments are good enough for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and for Blaenau Gwent, they are good enough for Taff-Ely, Rhondda and Cynon Valley. The illogicality of the proposals has been exposed for all to see.

We are not engaged in a semantic or statistical game; we are setting a pattern for local government for the next century. Those of us who have served at all levels of local government know that we are discussing the delivery of vital services on which people depend in order to live a decent life. Local government looks after people and has always done so, almost from their birth until the day that they die. That is what we are discussing; the Bill is not a statistical exercise and it is certainly not a semantic one. The Secretary of State has let down the people of Wales and he has especially let down the people of Rhondda and of the valley communities.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): The amendments standing in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) aim to delete Port Talbot from the proposed Neath/Port Talbot part of Lliw unitary area. I also support new clause 11, which would provide self-determination for the many communities in Wales that are incensed by the present proposals. If that principle were accepted, it would go a long way to meet our needs.

I am grateful that our amendments have been selected because, despite the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Neath, he failed to persuade a majority of the Committee to support other amendments to the same effect

[Mr. John Morris]

—we lost by 14 votes to 11. The reason was that the Government not only moved the goalposts but changed the venue. Although the Bill deals solely with Welsh matters, the Government packed the Committee with English Conservative Members who had no interest in the issues but merely carried out their obligation to support the Government, come what may. Like Pavlov's dogs, when the bell rang they voted no. Welsh Labour Members, who comprise the overwhelming majority of Welsh representatives, were denied places on that Committee, and that is the democratic deficit in decision-making on the structure of local government in Wales.

The result is clearly linked to the absence of a Welsh assembly, which is to be the subject of our next debate. Local government would have been the responsibility of that assembly, and those who would have known about such things—because they would have been democratically elected—would have been able properly to determine the needs of local government in Wales. Alas, there is no Welsh assembly, and decisions are therefore taken by a succession of English Secretaries of State. I sometimes wonder how much better the decision-making process is since the coming of the Welsh Office.

Given that we have had a series of English Secretaries of State, I should like to know who is really behind the proposals. It cannot be the Secretary of State because he would not know anything about the issues and had not heard of our problems before he got his little Cabinet place to represent Wales. Are junior Ministers responsible? I suspect that they would not have the interest, energy or zeal to cut across clearly defined local views, as has happened to my constituents. Is the political adviser to the Secretary of State responsible? He was my Conservative opponent at the previous election. He should certainly know better, although, when a delegation came to see him and the Secretary of State's predecessor, he excelled himself by sitting on the fence. If it is not the democratically elected people who are responsible, who is the grey figure in the Welsh Office who has made this determination?

I compare what is happening in Wales with what is happening in England. It is fascinating to learn that each household is to be consulted. There is certainly a divergence in the recommendations of the commission under Sir John Banham. We never had a commission, but I was one of those who advocated it. I was especially interested to read Sir John Banham's letter to The Times on 22 March. He wrote:

> "It will be most unwise to press ahead with changes to create unitary authorities unless there is clear local support for change and there are local champions for particular local situations."

The reasons adduced for the resurrection of Rutland are fascinating—it is argued that there is a strong sense of community felt by local residents. We want to know how Port Talbot and Neath differ; so far, the Secretary of State has failed the test.

I have not time today to tell the House, as I did on Second Reading, about the results of polls, inquiries and tests that were conducted locally in Port Talbot and Neath in order to ascertain local opinion. Sir John Banham makes it clear that it would be "most unwise" to proceed unless there were clear local champions for change. If the Secretary of State could tell me who the local champions for change in Port Talbot and Neath are, I should be delighted to hear him—in the face of the unanimity of views of members of the public, the leaders of local government and the councils, of whatever hue or political persuasion. Do not we, like Rutland, have the strong sense of community that lies behind the Banham commission's determination?

The Secretary of State put the cat among the pigeons with his death-bed—or pre-shuffle—repentance to allow Merthyr to survive. I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on their efforts, but I suppose that the Secretary of State wanted to show that he was a responsive and sensitive man and decided to give something away, just like old-fashioned colonial Governments did to pacify the natives.

How do we differ? In his letter to me on 28 April, the Secretary of State, with reference to our population, economic regeneration and efforts to attract new industry, could say only:

> "I am not convinced by the claim, in the document you sent me, that there is any justification for a population growth prediction for Port Talbot. Although the population figures for Merthyr and Port Talbot tell a fairly similar story during the 1980s, Merthyr's population had by the beginning of the 1990s recovered to the level of the early 1980s. This cannot be said of Port Talbot."

What is the position? The drop in population has been arrested and is now being reversed, but the House should know what caused the drop in population in the 1980s. It was a Tory Government, under such luminaries as Keith Joseph—now Lord Joseph—Lord Walker, and Lord Howe, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, who decimated our steel industry and we lost 7,500 jobs in a matter of years. In response, they provided only a totally inadequate amount of alternative jobs. That is where the responsibility lies. The young people walked with their feet or, as Lord Tebbit would have it, they got on their bikes to find work.

Today, there is a change. With first-class communications and despite the fact that the Government have taken away our development status, there is an increase in population and 655 more dwellings have been constructed in Port Talbot in the past six years, compared with 22 in the previous six years. The Registrar-General has been proved wrong in his forecast, because he estimated that the population in 1990 would be 48,800 whereas, in fact, at the last census in 1991, it was 51,000. The Secretary of State has failed to take into account what is happening. With all due regard to Merthyr and Blaenau Gwent—I have done a little in my time to help and support regeneration in those areas—I do not think that it is understood that, given our situation and our communications, the potential is much greater in any area contiguous to the sea than in an area which does not have those communications and advantages.

In the years ahead, when the economy recovers—it has not recovered yet for us—we shall see a dramatic upturn in the population. The period of severe difficulties in the early 1980s is history. The availability of good industrial sites, the improved attractiveness of the borough as a place in which to live and, especially, the provision of quality housing, is changing the whole situation. It is for the Secretary of State to justify the case for change. The onus is on him. Sir John Banham makes it clear in that letter from The Times, from which I quoted, that the responsibility is on those who propose a change. I fear that the blinkered response of the Government, their failure to take account of strongly held local views and the way in which they have ignored completely the change that is taking place in our population and our hopes and prospects for the future will result in grave disappointment tonight in Neath and in Port Talbot over what the Government are doing to those two great boroughs.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I rise to support the two new clauses as one who served for a couple of years on what was one of the old county boroughs in Wales—Merthyr. I am delighted to see that back as a unit in its own right. The lessons that are relevant to Merthyr are relevant elsewhere as well. Community matters very much in Wales and we want to see units of government that respond as closely as possible to natural communities.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) mentioned, had we had an elected Welsh parliament or an assembly which drew up a scheme for local government, I have no doubt that there would have been a much greater sensitivity towards the need to identify with communities, because the people in such an assembly would have grown from those communities themselves.

That brings us to the basic question—new clause 11, in referring to a referendum, touches on it—of the legitimacy of the proposals before us. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred to the elected dictatorship in the Welsh Office. Of course, the Secretary of State is not even elected from within the community of Wales, the future of which we are discussing.

If hon. Members agree that, as I would certainly claim, our authority to speak in this place or, indeed, to speak in any forum, be it a local authority or a Parliament, comes from the people, the legitimacy of these changes and the rights of the people who are so much affected by the changes to the local government structure of a community within which those services will be delivered must grow from the people whom the changes serve.

The new structures of local government must identify with the communities that they serve and must have the support of the people who live in them. That is the basic difference between Conservative Members and some Opposition Members. Across the Opposition parties, we believe that our sovereignty and legitimacy grow from the people upwards and not from institutions down. Therefore, especially in drawing up structures of government, there must be an identification with the wishes of people.

5.15 pm

Clearly, on that basis, and especially if the attempt to do away with the change agreed in Committee, which rescued Montgomeryshire, is successful and the unit of Powys comes back into existence, the proposals before us are a model of local government which falls between two stools. We shall have unitary local government authorities that are too large to be truly local and too small, in some ways, to be strategic authorities.

The whole point of the exercise was to try to get a more efficient system of government. I listened to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) saying that he believed in a two-tier system of local government. I understand his reasons and I understand the lack of the legitimacy of joint authorities taking decisions, which is one stage removed from democracy, but there is a strong argument for having unitary authorities, provided that they are the right size and are drawn up with the right borders. As I saw when I served in Merthyr, there was an ability to bring together housing and social services, for example, where so many of the problems have a commonality. However, for that system to work, the units must be regarded as local by the population.

Clearly, in the case of Montgomeryshire and Meirionnydd, there is a great groundswell of feeling that the proposed unit is not a unit of local government in the sense in which the people of those two areas regard local government. I suspect that the same thing may well be true in Brecon and Radnor and I recognise that it is true in historic communities such as the Rhondda and, indeed, in areas such as Taff Ely. If people in those areas of Montgomery, Meirionnydd and the Rhondda feel so strongly about their identity and if the proposed unit is the unit of government, the provisions of the new clause should be made available so that those people may have the final word on the structure of local government, or at least on the boundaries of the local government authorities within which they will operate.

Indeed, if the people of Dwyfor or Arfon or any other part of Wales feel that way, such mechanisms should be made available. To achieve any authenticity to the changes that the Secretary of State is putting forward, given the widespread and deeply held feelings that have been expressed, he would be well advised to take up the new clause. If he is not happy with the wording, there is an opportunity to change it in another place, but if we do not put the new clause into the Bill at this stage, that opportunity will be lost.

May I move from the generality of the size of units to the implications of new clause 2, which raises the question of the identification of communities in the new unitary authorities in which they have been placed? There is no doubt that, in many parts of Gwynedd, people in the communities there feel that they should be in an adjacent area.

I have received representations from people in places such as Llanfairfechan and Penmaenmawr who identify with the old Caernarfonshire and the Arfon area. I know that parts of the Conwy valley have expressed similar sentiments. At different times, people in parts of Edeyrnion have expressed similar feelings. Those feelings may or may not be reflected by the relevant community councils. That point was made by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). He said that the matter should be one for a community meeting rather than simply for a community council so that the grassroots feeling about the proposal could be ascertained.

I hope that the Secretary of State will accept that there are communities, particularly at the southern end of the Aberconwy and Colwyn area, which are very rural. They are Welsh-speaking communities and they identify more closely with the old Caernarfonshire and the type of authority that is likely to come about there than with the seaside towns of Colwyn Bay and Llandudno. I am not making a value judgment about the two areas, but the people I am talking about identify with a different community. They would like to find a mechanism whereby that identity could be recognised.

The Government's response will be that those points may be considered afterwards by boundary commissioners. Once the Bill receives Royal Assent, the proposals will become tablets of stone. Only in very remote circumstances would drastic changes be made. Flexibility should be built into the Bill now.

New clauses 2 and 11 provide the Government with the opportunity to be flexible. If the Government refuse to accept the new clauses, it will be impossible to have a structure that is more finely tuned in terms of the new units of unitary government and the borders that allow communities to identify with a particular unitary authority.

For those reasons, my colleagues and I will support the new clauses. Even at this late stage, I urge the Government to find the sensitivity to the wishes of the people of Wales, locally in their communities, that the people certainly deserve.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Just a week ago, I undertook a successful foray into north Wales on a beautiful summer's day. I felt certain that we were going to win that particular seat. At the time, I was travelling through the Mid and West Wales constituency which, I knew from earlier election activity, we were going to win.

As I travelled along, my mood changed from delight to elation as I heard the Secretary of State for Wales speaking on the radio. With regard to the European elections, he said:

> "I am happy to accept the verdict of the electorate. I take them seriously."

I was so amazed by that that I stopped the car to take his words down before I forgot them. I wanted to ensure that I could quote them to him exactly this afternoon.

On that basis, I speak with some confidence today that the Secretary of State, even at this 11th hour and 59th minute, will be prepared to change his mind about the communities of Ewenny, St. Bride's Major and Wick in respect of which I have tabled amendments.

What is the will of those three communities? They have expressed their will in five ways. Ogwr borough council conducted a postal ballot in which 80 per cent. of the people said that they wanted to stay with Bridgend in a turnout of nearly 60 per cent. Some 84 per cent. of the businesses that responded stated that they wanted to stay with Bridgend.

Ogwr and Vale of Glamorgan borough councils organised meetings in each of the communities as a result of which, 93.3 per cent. of those who attended wanted to stay in Bridgend, with only 2.5 per cent. opting for the Vale. The Electoral Reform Society organised a ballot. In Ewenny, 89.7 per cent. voted to stay with Bridgend on a turnout of almost 80 per cent. In St. Bride's Major, 87.8 per cent. voted to stay with Bridgend on a 75 per cent. turnout and in Wick, 81.2 per cent. voted to stay with Bridgend on a 75 per cent. turnout.

Between 175 and 200 people attended the famous—or infamous—public meeting at which the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) put the case for moving into the Vale of Glamorgan. Although the hon. Gentleman spoke at length in reply to my intervention, he failed to mention the fact that only one person from those three communities at that meeting supported the hon. Gentleman's view. The rest clearly wanted to stay with Bridgend.

Mr. Sweeney: As I made clear in my speech to the House, some members of the public at the meeting were not allowed to vote because they came from the Vale of Glamorgan and not from the constituency of the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths).

Mr. Griffiths: The three communities should decide their own fate. Even if the people from the Vale of Glamorgan had voted, I hazard a guess that the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan would have had difficulty achieving double figures in support of his case.

In the wake of public opinion, it is also interesting to contrast two elections that took place in those communities. The first took place in 1991 before the proposals came to light and the other took place in 1993 after they came to light.

In the borough council elections in 1991, the Labour candidate managed to poll 187 votes while the top Tory received 502 votes. That was before the proposals saw the light of day. In the county council elections in the same area, the Labour candidate received 1,082 votes while the Conservative candidate received 935 votes. That Conservative candidate also supported the case that those three communities should be part of the Bridgend unitary authority.

Mr. Sweeney: Is not it fair to say that there are many different reasons why people vote in elections? If the hon. Gentleman wants to be strictly logical, based on the information that he has provided, it would appear that the Conservative candidate was defeated in the county council elections because that person supported Labour policy on the matter rather than the Government's policy.

Mr. Griffiths: The Labour candidate wanted the communities to remain part of Bridgend. For the first time ever, the seat was won by the Labour party despite the spirited efforts of the Conservative candidate to make it clear that she was totally opposed to her Government's policy and that she would like the areas to remain with Bridgend. In that context, one could argue that 100 per cent. of the voters were opposed to the Government's policy in that area.

The two borough councillors representing the area and living in it are totally opposed to the Government's proposals. My hon. Friends the Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) mentioned the letter from Councillor David Unwin, the leader of the Conservative group on Ogwr borough council and chairman of one of the community councils involved in the fight. He made clear his total opposition to what the Government are trying to do.

Other people have been involved. Reference has been made to Mr. Trevor Jones, who, as part of his campaign, is not even prepared to spend money in the Vale of Glamorgan any more because he is so disgusted with what the Government are doing. In a letter to the Western Mail of 13 June, he says:

> "As a result, my wife and I, and our five children of voting age, will not consider voting Conservative again until the policy is reversed and the people of Wick, St Brides Major and Ewenny are told they are to remain with Bridgend.
> The persons who have influenced our decisions are . . . Secretary of State for Wales" together with the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan

> "and other Conservative members of the Standing Committee of the Local Government (Wales) Bill now before Parliament."

5.30 pm

In addition, the three communities publicly made clear their opposition in the Western Mail. Very interestingly, a most distinguished former president and chairman of the Bridgend Conservative Association, Mr. Forbes Hayes, also wrote to the Western Mail, saying:

> "I write as a life-time resident of the Bridgend area, where I and my family have developed many interests, including substantial industries, and as a strong Conservative, having been > constituency chairman."

He went on to say that he totally opposes the proposals. On top of that, he rang me in the House of Commons yesterday and said, "Make sure that you tell the House that I will not maintain my membership of the Conservative party, that I will give no more money to the Conservative party, and that I will encourage as many people as I can to do exactly the same unless the proposals are reversed."

It is quite clear that the Government are virtually friendless in those three communities. Of course, the Government have tried to argue why that should be. In the House of Lords, Lord Prys-Davies, speaking for the Opposition, clearly showed how the Government were disingenuous and even deceitful in the notes on clauses. In respect of the communities of Cynwyd and Llandrillo, the Government said:

> "These amendments reflect the weight of representations from the areas concerned".

On Delyn, the notes stated:

> "The decision to amend the White Paper proposals to include in Flintshire the whole of Delyn reflects the overwhelming weight of local opinion".

On Ystradgynlais and Tawe Uchaf, the notes stated:

> "The communities of Ystradgynlais and Tawe Uchaf have been added to Mid-Wales since the White Paper was published in accordance with the strongly expressed wishes of local residents".

In some of those changes, the Government did not even have the evidence of a referendum; they had only letters from community councils. In the case of my three communities, they had other forms of evidence, yet in their notes on clauses they chose only to say:

> "largely rural and agricultural, have more in common with the Vale of Glamorgan authority than with the town of Bridgend and with the industrialised valleys to its north".

The Government should have added, "Even though the overwhelming weight of opinion is to remain with Bridgend, we nevertheless ignore it." That is what the Government are doing.

The Government have argued in letters to me and to my constituents and in the House of Lords that the Vale of Glamorgan is more used to dealing with small rural communities. The truth is that in Ogwr there are six community council areas with smaller populations than that of St. Bride's Major, the biggest of the three communities. In the Vale of Glamorgan, there is only one community with a smaller population than that of St. Bride's Major. The Government also told me in a written answer that they did not know the size of those communities, even though they were writing to tell people that it was because of the preponderance of small communities in the Vale of Glamorgan that they were making the change. The reverse was true.

On the issue of rurality, according to designations for planning, more of the Vale of Glamorgan—20 per cent. —is regarded as a built-up area, whereas the built-up area in Ogwr is just 15.4 per cent. People working in agriculture account for 1 per cent. in Ogwr and just over 1 per cent. in the Vale of Glamorgan. About 20 councillors in Ogwr represent rural areas as opposed to industrial areas, and about 20 councillors represent rural areas in the Vale of Glamorgan. On rurality, there is very little to choose between the two areas.

The Government were forced into arguing about the snow plough from the Vale of Glamorgan going half a mile along the road to clear snow in the community of Wick in Mid Glamorgan. The truth is that that has never happened. Mid Glamorgan always clears snow from roads in Mid Glamorgan in the borough of Ogwr. The only reason that the snow plough from the Vale of Glamorgan goes into Ogwr is in order to find a place to turn around to go back into the Vale of Glamorgan.

Lord Rodger of Earlsferry also said in the other place that some people in those three communities

> "sometimes advertise their houses as being in the Vale"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 February 1994; Vol. 551, c. 1737.]

—not all, not many but just some—and that that was another good reason to make the change. He also said, rather amazingly, that the communities of St. Bride's Major and Wick were nearer to the community of Colwinston than they were to the community of Bridgend. He could just as easily have said that the community of Colwinston was nearer to Wick and St. Bride's Major than it was to Barry. We are seeing a mirror image of that debate, with the Government totally ignoring the will of the people.

Historically—since 1093—those three communities have been a part of the Bridgend area, and the Government are trying to wrest it from its historical place. As for the geography, those three communities are far closer to Bridgend than to Barry. For some people, it is only a 10-minute walk to the centre of Bridgend. If they tried to walk to Barry, it would take them a day and a half. There are many reasons why the change should be made.

On top of that, there are fears about schools and about the health service. Although to some extent the market could mitigate against some effects, there are problems in both areas.

I hope that the Secretary of State will be true to his words and will be happy to accept the verdict of the electorate and take it seriously by saying today that the three communities will remain with the Bridgend unitary authority.

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): Like my constituents and my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), I, too, can see no logic in the Secretary of State's unwillingness to grant unitary status to Taff Ely. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), I would point out that when we see a snow plough it is usually because it is lost.

The Secretary of State's decision smacks of inconsistency in terms of the comparison of the size of the districts that are proposed, their populations, the nature and quality of the services offered by district authorities and the history of existing local government structures. I have been among the least enthusiastic of right hon. and hon. Members to see the demise of our county authorities. I do not relish seeing the wider duties which their excellent staff and work forces now fulfil in many areas of public life, from the provision of special needs education to strategic communications, farmed out to much smaller, less powerful authorities and all kinds of dubious proposed joint committees and assorted quangos.

Last Saturday, I attended a fete at the estimable Pentyrch primary and junior school. I spoke to parents of disabled children who have been integrated at no little cost into the mainstream of pupils at that school. Those parents are extremely worried about the implications for their children's education of the proposals for local government reorganisation. Indeed, many people in that village and its neighbour, Gwaelod y Garth, are worried about being delivered lock, stock and barrel from Taff Ely and from Mid Glamorgan into Cardiff. Taff Ely is worried about losing Pentyrch and Gwaelod y Garth. We need high-quality, high-value housing located in those communities if we are to attract the managers and executives who are now required by an advanced economy. We need the beautiful rural countryside and the drama of the limestone gorge of the lower Taff valley. They are key assets to our borough. The people of those communities have always been part of the valleys, industrially and culturally; they have never been part of the flat lands of Greater Cardiff.

At least the name Taff has been retained in the proposed title of the new authority, Rhondda, Cynon, Taff. RCT —it sounds like a breakaway from the railwaymen's union. But the Ely component of Taff Ely has disappeared completely—as though the communities of Tonyrefail, Coedely, Llantrisant and Pontyclun have been beamed up at the request of some Vulcan warlord. It has taken 20 years to integrate the old districts of the Taff valley, such as the town of Pontypridd, with those of the Ely valley. Now that Taff Ely thinks of itself as a viable administrative entity, it is about to be subsumed into this proposed triple alliance.

The citizens in my constituency view the Secretary of State's proposals with mistrust. They want much greater assurances about the future integrity and security of their health, education and welfare services before they accept the proposals as a blueprint for the sort of future to which they aspire.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I shall be brief. I merely endorse what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said when he argued the case for Port Talbot and what my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) will say when he argues the case for Neath. I was able to put the case for Llanelli. As Lord Howe pointed out in another place, Llanelli, Port Talbot and Neath are the same kind of communities. All of them still have an industrial base. About 30 per cent. of the people of Llanelli work in what is described as productive industry; I imagine that the figures for Port Talbot and Neath are about the same.

My right hon. and learned Friend argued the case for Port Talbot in the House; he was not able to argue the case in Committee because he was not a member. When I argued the case for Llanelli, I believe that, together with those on the Labour Front Bench, I won the argument, but we lost the vote by one. The arguments that have been made in the House today are the same as those that were made in Committee.

Neath and Port Talbot are put together as two industrialised communities. The concern in Llanelli is that, because it is an industrialised community, it will be subsumed in a greater Carmarthenshire, which is a large agricultural and rural area. That is not to say that there is anything wrong with rural areas, but their problems are quite different, as we discussed in Committee.

As the Minister knows well, there is real concern that projects such as the regeneration of south Llanelli and the redevelopment of the Llanelli town centre will be hindered and put back as a result of the reorganisation. I ask the Secretary of State again at this late stage to reconsider the case for Llanelli—just as my hon. Friend the Member for Neath will argue for Neath and just as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon argued for his constituency—because of the industrial character of the Llanelli constituency.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) put with great eloquence the case for keeping Port Talbot as a separate institution. The amendments that he has tabled, and which I support, would achieve that objective and leave Neath standing free, together with upper Lliw. That is a much more logical alternative to the spatchcock proposal put forward by the Secretary of State.

I shall make several brief points. First, there is real anger in Neath at the Government's failure to listen to local wishes—they have been expressed unanimously, even by local Conservatives—as regards the retention of Neath as a separate borough. That unanimous opinion, which has been measured in opinion polls and surveys—and, indeed, in the submissions made to the Secretary of State on this matter—has been completely ignored and trampled on.

There is real anger, too, about the hypocrisy of English Tories who will vote tonight completely to ignore the wishes of communities in Wales while they are objecting to the Government's proposals for similar local government reform in England. Four members of the Committee—the hon. Members for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) and for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley)—are on record as criticising or flatly opposing the Government's proposals for their own communities in England, but they are completely ignoring the wishes of local people in Wales.

Another individual whose action has been greeted with anger in Neath is the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), who asked for and received the support of the Labour Members on the Committee. He supports the retention of autonomy in the communities within Powys in a separately identifiable sense but refuses to support that same principle with regard to Neath, Port Talbot, Rhondda, Taff and the other communities that have been identified. The logic of the principle applies equally to those communities.

The Secretary of State completely failed to mention the fact that Neath is second only to Cardiff as the longest-standing and most historic borough in Wales. That has been ignored. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) for the way in which he, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith), achieved separate authorities for those areas. There is no logical reason why, if those areas have been granted separate status as unitary authorities, Neath could not have been as well.

5.45 pm

There is a serious point underlying all these boundary questions. Local authorities are vital mechanisms for acquiring and reproducing democratic legitimacy for local people in their structures of government. Last week, the miserable turnout in the European Union elections showed how little legitimacy those institutions have among the people of this country and, indeed, the whole of western Europe. If we have artificial communities which have no serious common interests—in the case of Neath and Port Talbot, there is a lot of traditional and historic rivalry—and which are forced together, we cease to have the legitimacy on which democracy is built. These communities are proud; that is why their democracies thrive locally. The Secretary of State has completely failed to recognise that in his proposals.

Mr. Llew Smith: I shall be brief because the question of Llanelli dominated the debate in Committee. Indeed, some hon. Members have suggested that the title of the Bill should be changed from the Local Government (Wales) Bill to the Local Government (Llanelli Community) Bill.

The original proposal was that the Llanelli community should be part of Powys. That was crazy because, as I emphasised in Committee, that would mean that local councillors attending meetings during the week would be away from home for six days. Even the Government recognised that that was not on. As a result of the campaign conducted by the borough council, the community council and the local people, the Government backed down.

The local people are now asking for a say in determining their destiny in response to the Government's decision that Llanelli community should be part of the borough of Monmouth. What I am doing is expressing the feelings of the local community. If I were speaking in terms of party political advantage, I would be supporting the Government's proposals, because, if the Llanelli community went into the borough of Monmouth, both the borough of Monmouth and the Monmouth constituency would be Labour controlled after the next local and general elections. While we obviously welcome that, we are still willing to put aside party advantage and express the wishes of the people.

The people of Llanelli wish to be part of Blaenau Gwent because of the history and traditions of the community. They are mainly employed in the coal and steel industries, as are the people in the borough of Blaenau Gwent. The people of Llanelli wish to be part of the borough of Blaenau Gwent because housing, environmental health and financial services are only three miles away from their little community. They wish to be part of the borough of Blaenau Gwent because Blaenau Gwent has objective 2 status and previously had development area status. Obviously, they want to be part of that. Indeed, not long ago the Government recognised that they should have been part of it.

We are saying that we have to create local government boundaries in such a way that local people can relate to the decision makers and feel they have some control over them. If the Llanelli community becomes part of Blaenau Gwent, people will feel that they have some say in their destiny. If the Government insist that it should go to Monmouth, they will no longer get that feeling: they will become divorced from local government decision making and will be dejected as a result.

Mr. Roger Evans: I am driven to rise to my feet as a result of the speech made by the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith). It may have escaped the notice of some hon. Members that I represent Llanelly Hill in Parliament. I presented a petition signed by 1,900 out of nearly 3,000 electors expressing a preference for being in Monmouthshire. The hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten the fact that Blaenau Gwent lost the referendum in Llanelly Hill and that Monmouthshire won it. I know that there can be all sorts of explanations when opinion polls or referendums do not meet the purposes for which they were devised—

Mr. Llew Smith rose—

Mr. Evans: I shall not give way because I am going to sit down. The Government should be congratulated on recognising the majority sentiments in Llanelly Hill.

Mr. Redwood: After three years of consulting, weeks in Committee and full debates in the House and the other place, Labour has come back with a half-baked proposal that would throw Welsh local government back into chaos and uncertainty. The House would not know how things might end up. Staff of local authorities would have to suffer further delays before knowing the final shape of Welsh local government. They would be far from happy should Labour succeed in winning the vote on the new clause and we oppose it strongly on that and other grounds.

The hon. Members for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and for Neath (Mr. Hain), the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and those representing Taff Ely and Port Talbot talked of their wishes for their communities to have separate councils. I understand their passion and their advocacy, but they must understand that a balance has to be struck between community identity, which is very strong in many of the communities of Wales—communities far smaller than those represented tonight in this debate—and cost and service delivery issues, which are also important.

Had we come before the House with proposals for many more councils, Opposition Members would, I am sure, have made great play of the extra costs and staff involved and the problems of delivering certain services. As it was, they made enough play of some of those.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Before the Secretary of State goes further, can he explain the logic of dividing Merthyr and Blaenau Gwent and putting together Rhondda, Cynon and Taff Ely?

Mr. Redwood: In each case, where one should draw the line is a difficult judgment. I decided that the separate history and former status of Merthyr, which is different from that of the other boroughs that the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) mentioned, were sufficient reason, given its size and the other considerations brought to my attention. That was the judgment that I put before the House and that Ministers put in Committee.

A judgment has to be made in each case. Wherever we draw the line, people will say that we have drawn it in the wrong place. They will say, "Why can't I have my local community, with a separate unitary council?" or "Why have you so many local councils? Won't it be too expensive? Wouldn't it be better to have bigger ones to deliver the services?" We have to find that balance, which is what we are recommending to the House.

Clause 6 of the Bill and section 55 of the Local Government Act 1972 contain provisions for the Local Government Boundary Commission for Wales to undertake an initial review of the electoral arrangements of all the new unitary authorities as soon as possible after the first elections and of those boundaries where anomalies are thought to remain.

I hope that Opposition Members will recognise that the boundary commission is an objective body, which can take a dispassionate view of any outstanding issues. We believe that we have the structure right and we are recommending it to the House.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Is the Secretary of State saying that the boundary commission could consider the three communities that he seems determined to take out of Bridgend and decide to put them back?

Mr. Redwood: The boundary commission can come to its own conclusions within its terms of reference. Those terms enable it to review boundaries where it thinks that it needs to suggest an alternative proposal.

I want to clear up some of the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). He was right to say that there had been representations to the Welsh Office for an independent Montgomery. He omitted to mention the fact that similar representations had been made in favour of a maintained Powys. He made no mention of the shire committee proposals which I introduced to balance community identity with service delivery.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is wrong in his general allegations. He knows that they are wrong and he should withdraw them. If he is interested in my views at the time that I was Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, he should look at the public record. I have managed to procure a copy of my main speech on the subject in October 1992—just before the time when he purports to represent my views—at a party conference. It was a clear statement of my views. I said that the purpose of the review in England was not to carve the country up into a certain number of administrative units of a given size, whatever peoples' feelings and wishes. I went on to say:

> "In 1973 they decided the county of Rutland should be abolished because it was too small, but then they invented the county of the Isle of Wight, which was smaller than their model."

I specifically said:

> "Somerset, Herefordshire, Rutland, Huntingdonshire, the Ridings of Yorkshire, if you want your past to become your future say so and your wish can be granted."

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) would confirm that I was always very sympathetic to the case that he was making.

Mr. Alex Carlile: First, does the Secretary of State recognise that his shire committee proposals, as they appear in the amendments tonight, contain no financial guarantees for shire committees? Why is that so?

On his second point, if the right hon. Gentleman claims that he was, and remains, in favour of small unitary authorities such as Rutland and Huntingdonshire, why is he not in favour of small unitary authorities such as Montgomeryshire or Meirionnyddshire? Where is the logic in what he is saying? Let him tell the House how the Government changed their mind between early January 1993 and 1 March 1993. What were the reasons for that change of mind and who influenced it?

Mr. Redwood: The reasons for the new approach were set out by the former Secretary of State for Wales, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt). The hon. and learned Gentleman has been here long enough to know that no Government—Labour, Liberal or Conservative—ever make available internal minutes or correspondence between colleagues when they are reaching judgments that they then come to the House to defend.

I am not going to tell the hon. and learned Gentleman who intervened on what occasion in the debate. I can give him a strong promise and guarantee that I had my views, which I expressed at the time in public, on English local government reform. His allegations are untrue and he should withdraw them. I hope that, on reflection, he will do so. He did not produce a shred of evidence to support the contention that I intervened and caused a change of heart. Will he think again about the allegation? Does he seriously suggest that a Minister of State in an English Department can instruct a Secretary of State for Wales without recourse to the Cabinet and collective discussion? He is living in cloud cuckoo land in suggesting that.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I told the Secretary of State that I would be perfectly prepared to withdraw my allegation if we were told who was responsible for the change of mind. Does he deny that pressure was put on the Welsh Office by Ministers who were not Welsh Office Ministers to change its mind?

Mr. Redwood: I do not intend to reproduce debates in the Government at that time. The decision was made by the Government. The then Secretary of State for Wales was happy with it. The proposals were his, he presented and defended them, and I have carried them on, with some modifications of which the hon. and learned Gentleman is well aware. He knows that those modifications included certain boundary changes, to reflect the wishes of communities and the consultation evidence that we received and the introduction of more local identity through shire committees and—the biggest change of all—of an independent Merthyr.

Mr. Win Griffiths rose—

Mr. Redwood: I do not have time to give way. We must wrap up this debate so that we can get on to the other important business, which I know that Opposition Members want to discuss.

I am glad to see the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) in his place because he talked a great deal about the importance of democracy, and I entirely agree. I was interested, therefore, to receive a letter from Russell Goodway, the leader of South Glamorgan county council, urging me to support the hon. Gentleman's proposal. I find Mr. Goodway's view of democracy, as reported in the South Wales Echo, quite astonishing. The South Glamorgan leader is reported to have said:

> "The Tories promised cuts in public spending, so it seems to me that people who voted for those cuts should get them. That's democratic in my view."

I phoned Mr. Goodway to tell him that I was going to mention this, and he claimed that he was misreported. I hope that the hon. Member for Caerphilly will make it clear in the next debate that when he stands for democracy, he stands strongly behind the idea that anyone who is elected has to be fair in the interests of all constituents, and that includes being fair to Conservative wards in Labour-controlled councils. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will dissociate himself from Mr. Goodway's view.

Mr. Ron Davies: I assure the Secretary of State that I would deplore any proposition that any local authority, or Government for that matter, seeks to use the financial resources at its disposal to reward people of its own persuasion.

I shall put the record straight, however. The precise words used by Russell Goodway were:

> "It is very difficult to understand those people who vote for a Government that is committed to reducing the resources necessary to deliver services then expecting councils to have money, in other words when they vote they have been expecting cuts in services."

The quotes attributed to him were quite inaccurate.

Mr. Redwood: I am glad to hear that particular interpretation of Mr. Goodway's remarks. None the less, the remarks are a little less than edifying from one who tries to represent a large and important area of Wales. It is small step from what the hon. Gentleman reports to the remarks which the newspaper claims were made. [Interruption.] I accept the point made by the hon. Gentleman. I told the House that Mr. Goodway claimed that he was misreported, and there I shall leave the matter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I am sure that my hon. Friends will be interested in that statement, and in the reformulation of it which has clarified the record.

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Secretary of State to criticise a person in such an appalling way and, when corrected, not even to have the grace to withdraw?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The Secretary of State is responsible for his own speech.

Mr. Redwood: I contacted Mr. Goodway, who knew I was making the remarks. I did say that he thought that he had been misreported.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) dealt effectively with the points of the hon. Member for Bridgend on the communities. He made out a very good case for the three communities being part of the Vale, and he clearly disproved the idea that he was motivated by parliamentary electoral considerations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) also made a good point about the community of Llanelly Hill. Some Opposition Members have not quite grasped the importance of the measure which we have tabled tonight.

The proposal shows that we have listened in a large number of places to community representations. We have come to a good judgment on how Wales can go forward to a strong system of unitary authorities. I hope that, once the debates are over, Opposition Members will encourage their party colleagues to make a great success of this new system of local government for Wales. It is full of opportunity, and I want it to succeed.

Dr. Marek: We have had a thorough, and thoroughly unsatisfactory, debate. It is all very well for the Secretary of State to say that, once all the arguments are behind us, we should try to make a success of it. He is right in that. We must try to make a success of whatever system of local government we have.

It is right to remind the House that the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the people of Montgomery and Meirionnydd have been disregarded and thrown away. The balance is right according to the Secretary of State, but it is completely wrong according to the people of Montgomery and Meirionnydd.

Mr. Rogers: And of Rhondda.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend is right. For the people of Llangollen, the result was clear in the referendum.

The balance is wrong. It might be right for the Conservative party, but it is not right for the people of Wales. We must wait for the Local Government Boundary Commission to deal with the communities. No doubt it will put the matters right, because it is not motivated by political survival.

We must also wait for another Government, and a change of Government, before the serious matters are put right. It is my hope and conviction that we will not have to wait long. The Conservative party is now in third place in Wales and it is likely to stay there. [HON. MEMBERS: "Fourth place."] My hon. Friends say that it is in fourth place and, after what we have had to put up with and listen to this afternoon, it will stay there.

At the next election, we will have a Labour Government and all the Opposition parties will be united on the matter. We shall put the map of Wales right and listen to the people, whereas the Tory Government are concerned only with colonial administration from London.

Question put and negatived.

New clause 11

REFERENDUM ON BOUNDARIES (No. 2)

'(1) If, by resolution, the council of any district existing at the time this Act receives Royal Assent so requests, the Secretary of State shall, before appointing a day for the coming into force of Section 1 of and Schedule 1 to this Act, prepare a scheme for the conduct of a referendum to be held within the area of any such district council.

(2) A referendum under subsection (1) above shall be for the purpose of determining whether the local government electors of the district are satisfied with the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act so far as they affect the boundaries of any local government area for which they are electors.

(3) Where it appears to the Secretary of State from the result of any referendum held under subsection (1) above that a majority of the electors of any district do not approve of any change in boundaries affecting that district which would result from the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act, he may by order made by statutory instrument make any modification to that Schedule which he considers will reflect the result of the referendum; and any such order shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament and be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made, and Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 1

FUNCTIONS OF THE PRINCIPALITY AS A LOCAL GOVERNMENT AREA

'.—(1) There shall be established on 1st April 1996 a council for the principality of Wales, to be known as the Welsh Assembly ("The Assembly").

(2) The Assembly shall perform strategic functions for the principality in so far as they are relevant to the local government of Wales.

(3) The Assembly may do anything it considers necessary to—

(a) facilitate the co-ordination of administration of local government in Wales, and

(b) promote greater co-operation between the Welsh local authorities and public agencies and voluntary organisations in Wales.

(4) The Assembly shall represent the interests and views of Welsh local authorities collectively in the relevant institutions of the European Union.

(5) The Secretary of State shall consult the Assembly on all matters affecting local government and local and regional interests in Wales.

(6) The Assembly shall have power to appoint such officers as it thinks necessary for the proper discharge of its functions, on such reasonable terms and conditions, including terms as to remuneration, as it thinks fit.'.—[Mr. Morgan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also amendment No. 6, in clause 1, page 1, line 12, at end insert—

'(aa) the principality of Wales; and'.

Mr. Morgan: It is a pleasure to move the new clause, with its tiny consequential amendment. I hope that the debate will be fairly brief but extremely vigorous on this important topic of how a Welsh assembly fits into the Bill.

The new clause seeks to develop British democracy. Britain is a unitary state but with interesting ragged edges such as Wales, Scotland and, since the 1920s, Northern Ireland. The new clause recognises the special needs of Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having great difficulty in hearing what the hon. Gentleman has to say. Although only a few Members are in the Chamber, there is quite a buzz.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for your protection of my still, small voice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that we shall have the necessary co-operation from all those who are genuinely interested in this interesting debate.

The problem is that, since the 1880s in the case of the Scottish Office and the 1960s in the case of the Welsh Office, there has been administrative devolution. The 1980s saw further administrative devolution, with powers frequently taken away from local government and transferred to unelected quangos. People who have been defeated in a democratic contest by the electorate of Wales are often able to re-enter politics in an anti-democratic way by being made chairmen and chairwomen of quangos that take over the functions of local government.Thus the continuously moving target of devolution and democratic change in the past 16 years has, unfortunately, been largely undemocratic. Many previously democratically controlled functions have been quango-ised. In urban regeneration, housing and education, quangos have been set up to carry out functions that were previously carried out by democratic local government.

The people of Wales do not like that and regard it as creating a democratic deficit. They do not trust the Government or Secretaries of State who—with the exception of the then right hon. Member for Pembroke, now Lord Crickhowell—do not come from Wales. We have had four Secretaries of State since 1979, two of whom —including the present one—were closely connected with the Rothschild empire, and two of whom were closely connected with Lloyd's of London. Their experiences are millions of light years away from those of the average person who votes in Welsh elections. As a result, the Welsh electorate kicks back against the Government. It is fair to say that in last week's elections the Tories reaped the whirlwind for their contempt of the Welsh people. The Welsh people are looking for a bastion to protect them against the continual loss of democratic control over the functions of local government. The new clause attempts to solve that problem and to put right the democratic deficit that has built up in Wales since 1979.

Last week, the Tories reaped the whirlwind in the same way as the Canadian rugby team did by making various solicitous remarks about the Welsh and saying that in-breeding catches up with people in the end. The Welsh coach had merely to pin that remark on the Welsh changing-room wall for the team emerge on to the field like whirling dervishes and take Canada apart up front. We all saw the result of that. The last 15 years of Tory Government have been like pinning a notice on the changing room wall saying what the Tories thought of Wales and showing the contempt with which Wales is treated in a democratic sense. The result of the European elections last week was similar to the drubbing given to the Canadian rugby team. If Wales is treated with contempt, it will kick back.

The new clause attempts to interpret the views of the people of Wales, who want an assembly so that they cannot be mucked about by a Tory Government, as they have been over the past 15 years. An assembly would enable the functions of quangos, which have taken over so many local government functions, to be controlled democratically. A voice would be given to the people of Wales, enabling the functions of local government to be co-ordinated. In the context of the Bill, an assembly would alter how we decide all the issues that we discussed under new clauses 2 and 11.

Strategic functions could be carried out by an all-Wales tier, which would determine how big a local authority must be to deliver viable local services and provide a local identification. In the last debate, the Secretary of State was keen to refer to the figure of 20 local authorities. An all-Wales tier would mean that a different number could be chosen. The system would not have to be undemocratic, as it is now. That could be done without worsening the problem of the democratic deficit.

The entire proceedings through which the Bill has passed so far have been anti-democratic. The Standing Committee was packed with non-Welsh Members, the transfer of powers incorporated and hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg), the great expert on gerrymandering from Westminster, put on the Committee to act as a silent voter without participating in the proceedings. The Government's attempt at gerrymandering failed because they could not get the Bill through in time.

All those measures have worsened the democratic deficit from which Wales suffers. The people of Wales are looking to this House today to express, on behalf of all hon. Members—not just those on the Committee—what Wales needs most: local government reform, but with a strategic overview of matters in Wales. That should be provided not solely by the Welsh Office or all-Wales quangos funded by the Welsh Office. The Bill will make that problem worse as a result of the way in which the Secretary of State has handled it. In many ways, what has happened in Wales in the past 15 years has been much worse than what has happened in Westminster. Westminster tried to export Labour voters to adjoining boroughs, but in Wales when the Government lose local authority elections to Opposition parties—overwhelmingly Labour, but not always—they tend to say, "If people are going to keep voting Labour, we shall transfer functions out of local government, and thus out of the purview of the Bill, and put them under the control of appointed, patronage-based quangos directly funded by the Welsh Office." How do those quangos know what the people of Wales think?

If the Government were to accept the new clause, they would show that, despite the contempt that they have shown for Welsh people's views over the past 15 years, and the widening of the chasm between the political views of the Welsh people, shown in the European elections last week when the Conservatives dropped to third place— there is evidence that it will widen further at the next general election—they were willing to make a gesture to the Welsh people. Wales needs a defence mechanism against the depredations of successive Tory Governments. Given Tory Governments' lack of sympathy for the people of Wales and the countervailing lack of sympathy among the Welsh people for the Tory Governments who have ruled over them, the Government could say, "Let's establish a Welsh Assembly and make this country's constitution more workable."

A Welsh Assembly would act as a bit of oil in the wheels of the inevitable crunching that is now occurring between the Government and the people of Wales, who gave just 14.5 per cent. of their votes to the Tory party last week. One can see the dangers to this country's constitution when the Tories are faced with almost a wipe-out in Wales. That is why I am hoping against hope that we shall hear from the Secretary of State tonight that he is willing to listen to the views of the people of Wales. I hope that he will not regard himself as the equivalent, as Secretary of State, of all those Tory party candidates who are often sent to the valleys after doing a couple of years in Oxford and a couple of years as Guards officers and want to come to this place with a safe Tory seat but are told, "You have to try for a seat in the valleys first." We do not want the Secretary of State to regard the apprenticeship in Wales as something that he has to do for a couple of years before he is given a Cabinet job back in mainstream English politics.

Above all, the new clause would provide us with a guarantee. We do not want any more discrimination between, for example, the treatment of Rutland and Huntingdon in England and that of Montgomery, Port Talbot, Llanelli, the Rhondda and all the other authorities in Wales. That is the problem—that contempt for the people of Wales—to which new clause 1 would provide the solution.

6.30 pm

Mr. Roger Evans: I rise briefly because I was trying to intervene but missed my opportunity. From the passionate speech that we have just heard, one might have thought that the new clause was a proposal for a Welsh Parliament with real powers. It is typical—

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Hear, Hear.

Mr. Evans: I hear a sedentary objection from the nationalist Bench, because what the new clause proposes is extraordinarily different from the type of proposition that I suspect that the occupants of the nationalist Bench would want. This body is a super Welsh local authority at its most. It has no legislative or law-making powers. It has no taxation-raising powers. It has the most limited powers of expenditure. It is an attempt to create a quango-control body, but, at most, it is a modest and irrelevant extra layer which would achieve nothing and would simply disappoint those people who want a Welsh Parliament, to which my electors in Monmouthshire are firmly opposed.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): One of the numerous joys of serving on a Standing Committee is that during the debates or discussions one's mind either becomes clarified or more muddled or one at least starts to gain an impression of the way in which a piece of legislation will ultimately work. I will tell the Secretary of State, who did not share the joy of serving on the Standing Committee, of the impression that was left on me about certain aspects of the Bill and the way in which it relates to the new clause that we propose.

I gained the clear impression, as we went through the debate—there was not especially a party divide about it —that there genuinely were areas of local government administration and policy making which would not fit easily into a unitary authority structure. One thinks of strategic issues, especially in regard to mental health, child abuse, certain aspects of social services, strategic roads and planning aspects, which had been primarily a county function and which—I do not complain because I am pleased with some aspects of the pattern of unitary authorities that has emerged in relation to my area— unitary authorities of considerably varying sizes will have to try to deliver.

As the debates progressed through the various clauses, I do not know whether other hon. Members—or the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans), who was the most assiduous attender of the Committee and listened patiently in many cases to hours and hours of debate—were left with the impression that the sectors of trading standards, fire, services, roads, strategic planning and some social services functions, especially in relation to mental health and child abuse and so on, which had been county responsibilities, would not necessarily fit properly and easily into the pattern of unitary authority structure that we had proposed. As a result, it emerged that we would have a patchwork of possible alternative solutions to what was a county function—lead authorities, joint boards of one type or another—to deliver some of those services which do not fit into the pattern of unitary authorities of varying size; a sort of limbo-land democracy.

I do not like—I know that the Opposition have tended to recommend it frequently—the form of delegated democracy that occurs when it is decided that county or district councils will serve on this organisation or that body, to try to give an impression of a democratic body. I find that that type of delegated democracy—limbo-land democracy—does not work because in a sense people do not recognise the delegated member to be directly responsible to the community, as he or she would be if serving on the local authority or, as I would suggest, sitting in a Welsh assembly.

If one believes in democracy, democracy does not come cheap. No one is saying that it does. Democracy is more expensive. It is more expensive in administration. Consider the sheer amount of time that Whitehall spends trying to manage this place. I know that from my ministerial experience. This morning, I was watching the Foreign Secretary in the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. He had a large pile of files with him. He had spent, rightly and understandably, an enormous amount of time trying to anticipate every conceivable question that we might ask. So democracy does not come cheap, even in the present system.

We should not argue about the cost, therefore, but about whether an organisation is a valid instrument of democracy. I suggest that, as a result of all the changes that are occurring, some aspects of policy will not fit easily into the unitary authority pattern. Eventually, policy making and major decisions about resources will gradually drift back into the Welsh Office. The Welsh Office will need to shape those policies and will gradually take over and assume the strategic policy thinking in many of those sectors that lay with the county, but will now lie with either joint boards or lead authorities. I know that it will not necessarily be deliberately intended, but I think that the process will gradually return to the Welsh Office.

As a result, I think that the Welsh Office and the Secretary of State will become more powerful as a result of the Bill even than hitherto. When one considers the way in which, I am sorry to say, this place handles vital, fantastic issues of Welsh concern to us, we ought honestly to be appalled with ourselves and with the system. There were many quality contributions to this morning's debate, but what a truncated debate it was on an issue of profound concern to so many members of our community.

I was reading the preface to the Secretary of State's preface to the public expenditure White Paper produced by his Department—it was better presented than ever before and more interesting than ever before—stating powerfully just what a huge sum of money he has in his gift and responsibility. How much does this place analyse and scrutinise expenditure of that type? In spite of the invaluable work by my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) and the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, how much time do we spend on what is now one of the biggest collective spending Departments, with a fantastic range of functions, right across the board—quite rightly so? We all support it. We set it up and it has been built on and developed since. How much time and energy do we put into it?

I shall give an illustration to make the point. How much time and energy will the House spend on something that will shape the education of all our children in the years to come? How many debates will we have about the national curriculum proposals that are being published? Let us take as an example the document that I hold in my hand, the proposals for the national syllabus for history. They will eventually be put before us in a series of orders. We may possibly have a prayer, at some unearthly hour in the day or night, to discuss one or more of those.

The documents containing the national curriculum proposals will shape the education that is provided in our schools for a decade and more. In that document—the one that I was especially interested in—it is proposed, as I understand it, that no young person or child will learn about Welsh history after 1918. Are we to nod such proposals through? That is what is in the document. History stops in 1918. One thinks of the events of the 1930s, the 1940s and the 1950s, which shaped the critical social economic consciousness of our society, and shaped politics and social attitudes. Yet as I read that document, history after 1918 will not be taught in our schools. How much time and energy will be spent in the House debating matters of such profound concern as that? I have picked up only one of those syllabuses; there are others.

I know that the proposals will be subject to consultation and that we can make written representations. I have already done so in this case to the Secretary of State. Nevertheless, those issues should be debated openly. That is the very meat and drink of democratic political decision making.

I support unitary authorities, but I fear that some aspects of policy making which are dealt with at county level now will drift up to the Welsh Office, thereby enhancing its powers and those of the Secretary of State. I know that the Government will deny that, but, having heard the debate in Committee, I know that it is what will happen. And when it happens, hon. Members will find that we will not give it the necessary scrutiny. We will not find time in this place to discuss all the changes. This House is becoming more and more impatient, given all the European stuff that it has to consider.

I have two final points for the Secretary of State. Whatever happened to the grand debate, promised at Cardiff in a speech on 8 March 1993, to be initiated by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor? What has become of the revamping of the Government's counter-proposals to a Welsh democratic assembly? What happened to their promise to revamp the handling of Welsh affairs in this place? There has not been a single proposal since March 1993—although I do not know whether the usual channels have been working behind the scenes. I note that some of those involved—in Plaid Cymru—shake their heads. What has happened to the famous Hunt revamping proposal, which the current incumbent may now wish to deny knowledge of?

Anyone who knows his British history will recall that the Conservative party has been a great national party. It is, after all, the party of Peel and Disraeli, of Baldwin and Macmillan and occasionally—he was in and out—of Churchill. After the results of the past weekend, that great national party has become a regional and peculiarly English party. I never thought in my lifetime to see the Conservative party—even in my constituency it had hitherto always managed to get out its core vote of 25 or 30 per cent.—reduced to 14 per cent. of the vote.

That being so, the Secretary of State should ask himself what moral legitimacy he exercises when he rejects our demands for democratic accountability for the decisions that he, among others, will make, and for the powers he exercises that will be enhanced by this Bill. I do not expect the right hon. Gentleman to reply favourably this evening, but I hope that he will begin to think again about his legitimacy when saying no to the demands from Wales.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Apart from the sniping aimed by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) at my colleagues just now, I agreed entirely with everything he said. I spent six weeks in the Standing Committee, where we discussed scrutiny, and I am adamant that the hon. Gentleman is correct. There is not enough time to deal with Welsh legislation in the set-up that we have here.

We have notes on clauses comprising three sentences although they deal with highly complex strings of clauses. We should not be expected to nod such clauses through, but I am afraid that that is precisely what happened on some days in the Committee.

The fact that we have to compress a debate about the democratic process in Wales and the need for an accountable all-Wales forum into the few minutes that we have today serves to underline the need for a strengthened and better democratic procedure for the government of Wales. Plaid Cymru does not shy away from the fact that we need a full Welsh Parliament with legislative and tax-raising powers. Some Conservatives believe that we try to conceal that, but it is the very reason for our being. We do not deny it, and it is why we are here.

The new clause, however, represents a great step forward in the democratisation of the unfortunate process of government in Wales. A similar amendment was debated at length in another place and was defeated by only eight votes. Their lordships are not known for their radicalism, but even they realise the need for urgent and real change. Here we have the vehicle for such change.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: My hon. Friend referred to the debate in another place. Did he find it as remarkable as I did that many of the participants in that debate originally opposed any moves towards devolution and decentralisation in Wales, but that they have been convinced by 15 years of Conservative Government?

Mr. Llwyd: Not surprisingly, I agree entirely with my hon. Friend—I was coming to that very point. Earlier, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) said that there had been a referendum in 1979 so the matter had been decided once and for all. But many things have changed in the past 15 years. We have been subjected to a Government whom 85 per cent. of the electorate of Wales rejected at the last election and whom a far higher percentage rejected a few days ago.

I think that it was Harold Wilson who said that a week is a long time in politics. Certainly, 16 years of Tory misrule is a hellish long time. Were there to be a referendum today on this subject, there would be no doubt at all of the answer, as I am sure all Opposition Members will agree.

It is also preposterous to suggest that because there was a referendum in 1979 there should never be one again. That is an abomination. If it is true, why do we have votes on capital punishment so regularly? The issue has been decided time and again, yet I have no doubt that there will be future votes on it. Why should not the same apply to the subject of the government of Wales?

We in Wales need an all-Wales forum, for several reasons. We are a proud people. We want to play our true part in the development of the new European scene. Other historical regions, such as Catalonia, are enjoying a great measure of success. It is lucky that the Minister of State has just re-entered the Chamber; he has been to Catalonia on trade visits and knows that it is doing very well. The Catalans have a large measure of autonomy within the Spanish system. They can deal with their affairs on a European level: we cannot. We have to have our thoughts filtered through the enervating process which is Westminster. The corollary is that funding intended for Wales which comes through this enervating channel used to be stopped at source, until that was put right some time ago. The additionality argument has shown the great disincentives for Wales under the present system.

I think that Opposition Members to a man will agree that the current set-up is over-centralised to a ridiculous degree. In this Parliament, we have witnessed a tendency that runs contrary to everything happening in mainland Europe. I have referred to it before and I shall do so briefly again. The Governor of Hong Kong recently said:

> "We have to re-examine our understanding of the division of political power in the UK. I think we have become absurdly over-centralised. It was a great mistake of the 1980s, and I speak as one of those who made the mistake."

So even the Governor of Hong Kong, who is not averse to the political thinking of the Government, has come to the conclusion that some real democratic constitutional change is called for.

The Secretary of State for Wales exercises his functions in Wales as a governor-general. I do not expect him to agree with that, but he is responsible for housing, education, health, transport, the economy, agriculture and so on—

Mr. John Morris: And the honours system.

Mr. Llwyd: Yes, not that that worries me unduly. I believe that it is because of the concentration of powers and functions without true accountability that the people of Wales view the Welsh Office with such odium. All political parties in Wales agree on the principle of unitary authorities, and there is no argument about that on the Opposition Benches. I believe that the Government also agree. But I have to say that the lack of accountability of the 90 or so quangos currently operating in Wales worries many people. That might have been a factor in the Government's poor showing in 1992 and last week. Above all, local government reform must carry with it the consent of the people of Wales. The so-called reforms in the Bill do not have that consent.

Quite apart from the boundary arguments, which will probably be restated later this evening, and which are very important, there are many flaws in the legislation and we have not had adequate opportunity to scrutinise them properly. During the passage of the Bill, questions were asked and assurances were given, but the arguments have advanced very little. We are still, incredibly, very much in the dark as to the kind of animal that the Bill is and what will eventually come of it. Surely that is not the way to deal with legislation in a so-called democratic forum such as the House of Commons. We should know exactly where we are going and that what we are doing carries with it the will and consent of the people. That clearly is not the case in this instance.

If we do not have an all-Wales body accountable for strategic planning and also to scrutinise the quangos, I believe that we are making a grave mistake. We have a good opportunity now to deal with a major reform, which would democratise matters, and here is the vehicle to do it. But we hear consistently the tired argument that, "In 1979, the people of Wales said no, so you are not having it." Meanwhile, we see quangos spending billions of Welsh taxpayers' money without any true accountability. That really is a worrying feature of any democracy.

In Wales at the moment there is the scandalous situation that a quango seems to be a safe haven for every failed Conservative, or any Conservative who thinks that he or she is on the way up. By all accounts, those safe havens are free from any real scrutiny and that makes them untenable and unacceptable. The democratic deficit in Wales is a wide abyss which is ever-widening, and that concerns all Opposition Members. We must bring some form of scrutiny into force quickly. I know that there has been some tinkering at the edges in mid-Wales. I am not sure whether the Government's view on that is correct, but there is—I hope—some scrutiny of the current quangos.

It is a sad fact that £1.8 billion of taxpayers' money is distributed by 1,400 people who serve on those bodies—200 more people than there will be councillors under the proposed set-up in the Bill. The Government have an opportunity of addressing that democratic deficit. It is real, not perceived. I referred earlier to the way in which polls in Wales have gone against the Conservative party. I believe that it is because those quangos are looked upon with such disdain that the Conservative party is so unpopular. If it were not for the fact that every person in Wales has to spend money to keep them going it would be a laughable matter, but it is not.

Some 85 per cent. of the people of Wales voted in favour of parties that have in their manifestos some form of devolution, be it a full Parliament, which Plaid Cymru wants, an assembly, which the Labour party wants, or the assembly that is proposed by the Liberal Democrats. Consensus is a vital component of the Bill. It will affect each and every person in Wales, and therefore we need that consensus.

In another place, the opportunity was grasped by many in the debate and in the Lobbies. I believe that if the purpose of the Bill is to ensure good local government in Wales, the new clause and the consequential amendment should be carried. I therefore fully support the new clause and the amendment.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Part of the malaise affecting the governance of Wales is shown in tonight's rather rushed debate, as we are examining the new clause in just one hour. I adopt wholly what has been said, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) in respect of limbo-land, the movement of powers to the Welsh Office and the increasing alienation of the people of Wales. That is a real problem, which the Conservative party ignores at its peril, as we have seen in the results of not only the local elections but the recent European elections.

The Government are indeed isolated. I believe that their views are wholly undemocratic. I concede that many of the arguments that are now raised were rehearsed extensively in the 1970s and that I took a different view at the time. But on balance I have come to a different view for a number of reasons: partly because of the centralisation that has come over local government since that time; partly because of the nature of the local government changes; and partly because of the current modest proposal for a body to deal with the strategic issues in Wales, the co-ordination and so on. That body will develop, or not, according to the views of the people of Wales. It will go as far and as fast as the debate in Wales takes it. I believe that that is the proper democratic way in which it should be seen.

A further major factor has been the European dimension. The Secretary of State has a view within the Cabinet against the developments in Europe which I believe does the Principality great harm, but that is another debate. But it is clear that the diversity in the European Community, which is reflected in all countries save our own—the most centralised of the European countries—must have implications for us. The quangocracy was mentioned earlier, and the increasing self-consciousness of the people of Wales, which is to be applauded.

I have but one minute, so I shall finish on this point. The Secretary of State is noted for his intellectual rigour and the independence with which he approaches problems of this nature. I urge him to cast aside the old shibboleths of the past. One can make the political arguments about the Conservatives now being—perhaps they always have been—the English nationalists and that they are being forced into their own strongholds as a result of the past few elections, but I urge him to look at the issue afresh, because it is serious. In my judgment, the people of Wales are becoming increasingly alienated. The Conservative party is being increasingly isolated. It ignores the issue at its peril.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): In the debate on democracy in the European elections in my constituency nearly a week ago, the only candidate who did not turn up or send a representative was the Conservative candidate. We understand her impossible position in trying to justify the battered and abused democracy in Wales. A candidate who did turn up made a case saying that he did not believe in democracy, but in natural law. He thought that the world should be run by 7,000 yogic flyers. I reminded him that that is the sort of situation that we have in Wales. We have 7,000 people running the quangos, who are far more powerful than Welsh Members of Parliament, and far more powerful than all the members of local councils in Wales. What has happened in Wales is the mirror image of what has happened in eastern Europe. Even in countries such as Mongolia, Lithuania, Romania and Estonia, there was always a body of opinion—about 14 per cent. of people — who were genuine, ideological communists who believed in that system. There were shams of democratic institutions in all those countries in 1979 with no power. To achieve power, one had to be a card-carrying member of the communist party.

We have seen a transformation there, but we have seen the exact opposite in Wales over the past few years. There has been a decline in the power of all the democratically elected bodies; resources have been taken away from all the local authorities, and they have been replaced by quangos. I understand the enthusiasm for quangos expressed by the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans): he probably has more members of quangos as constituents than any other hon. Member, because of the "magic circle" in his area.

The point of tonight's debate is the way in which democracy has been destroyed in Wales. Hon. Members should look at the election figures. Last week, the Conservatives achieved a vote of 14 per cent.—a wipe-out, much closer to the vote secured by the Natural Law party than that secured by Labour. In last year's local government elections, Tories won 32 of 500 county council seats, and six Tory Members of Parliament were elected out of 38; in the district council elections Wales had 54 seats, of which the Conservatives won only one.

This is an abuse of democracy. The Tories are as popular in Wales now as Ceaucescu was in Romania at Christmas 1989. To deny democracy is dangerous and an abuse.

Mr. Redwood: Time and again, Labour makes a general statement against centralisation and then, by actions, words and deeds, shows that its centralising heart is beating ever more strongly. It is always urging me to solve every problem in Wales, where many problems can and should be solved by local government and—I trust—will be solved by local government, under the new structure that we recommend.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) for pointing out that the assembly proposed in the new clause is a toothless tiger, not the sort that the nationalists are recommending. Let me reassure the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) that I do not want more powers and functions to gravitate to me; I strongly recognise the importance of good local government in Wales and elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Let me tell the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) that I would not swap Wales for Catalonia, as he wishes to do: Catalonia's unemployment is much higher and our prosperity machine is in much better gear. I hope that he welcomes those facts.

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) suggested that Wales's system of local and national government was based on 7,000 yogic flyers on quangos. That may be the position on Newport council—I believe that it has set up a good many quangos, and it may be placing some odd people on them—but it is certainly not the Wales that I know and love. It is not the Wales represented by the Welsh Office and the House of Commons.

In Committee, Labour Members tabled amendment after amendment seeking more powers for the Secretary of State. They wanted me to call in planning applications more often to force local inquiries; they wanted me to designate strategic plan areas, to make more use of powers to monitor cross-border trading, to issue specific guidance to authorities on how to draw up service delivery plans, to issue more prescriptive guidance on decentralisation, to intervene to settle disputes between area committees and councils and to offer more guidance on transition committees. They even wanted me to draw up schedules of local authority members prescribing when they should retire. The Liberals joined in: they wanted me to establish a single trading standards authority for Wales, rather than such authorities being answerable to elected local government.

I would find Labour's attacks on quangos much more convincing if they ever countenanced the removal of any of the quangos that have been set up. When I suggest the abolition of some of them, howls of anguish go up from the Opposition Benches. Opposition Members cry, "No, Secretary of State, not this one—not now. Keep the quangos—keep them going." Labour councils themselves, of course, are mad keen on quangos. They have set up, or participate in, hundreds of them in Wales.

The other day, I read a list of appointments and nominations to outside bodies of just one council. Well over 100 bodies have places to which the council appoints its friends or councillors. They include everything from community centres to the Museum Council for Wales, best-kept village competitions, alms houses, community industry advisory panels, consortia of local authorities in Wales, the Federation of Industrial Development Associations—I have a much better list, but the time constraint is pressing. Quango-crazy Labour, in local government, even appoints—at public expense—national quango monitoring units, as Cardiff city council has done.

Labour should come down from its high horse and recognise that it is up to its eyes in quangos, that many of its people sit on them and that Labour councils have created far more quangos than the Welsh Office has ever dreamt of doing under a Conservative Government. It is local government's job to maintain proper control of the myriad local quangos that it helps to fund. Labour's proposals in the new clause would take powers away from elected local government in Wales and give them to a new regional assembly. I do not see why a new regional assembly would be better able to carry out the scrutiny required than local councils, which are closer to the local bodies concerned.

I believe that the Opposition leader-in-waiting—the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair)—favours more government for Wales. We look forward to his reconciling that with his only famous phrase so far. How did it go? "Tough on socialism", was it? "Tough on the causes of socialism"? We know his views, and his fashions come and go, like those of so many socialists nowadays. In 1983, he was against Europe; in 1994, he was head over heels in love with it. In 1983, he was against nuclear weapons; in 1994, no comment.

I suggest that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) checks carefully with the hon. Member for Sedgefield whether he has any chance of keeping his own job and whether the Welsh assembly is another policy that is here today and gone tomorrow. Certainly this policy is gone today—and here tonight I urge my colleagues to reject it.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Timothy Kirkhope and
Mr. Bowen Wells.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you received a request from a Transport Minister to make a statement to the House because I understand that No. 10 has now admitted that there has been direct ministerial involvement in today's strike? It would be helpful if the House were to be told that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): The occupant of the Chair has received no request for a statement.

New clause 13

MAGISTRATES' COURTS, JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ETC.

'.—(1) The Lord Chancellor may by order make, with respect to any matters mentioned in subsection (2), such incidental, consequential, transitional or supplemental provision as he thinks necessary or expedient in consequence of any of the provisions of this Act.

(2) The matters are—

(a) the functions or areas of jurisdiction of any justice of the peace, stipendiary magistrate, magistrates' court or keeper of the rolls for a commission area (within the meaning of the Justices of the Peace Act 1979); and

(b) commission areas, petty sessions areas and areas to which magistrates' courts committees relate.

(3) The Lord Chancellor may by order alter, in such manner as appears to him expedient in connection with the alteration in any local government area made by this Act, any of—

(a) the commission areas in Wales specified in section 1 of the Act of 1979,

(b) the areas in Wales which constitute petty sessions areas under section 4 of that Act, or

(c) the areas in Wales to which magistrates' courts committees relate under section 19 of that Act.

(4) Any order under this section may, in particular—

(a) make provision with respect to the costs and expenses of any persons with respect to whom provision is made by the order;

(b) apply (with or without modifications) or amend or repeal or revoke (with or without savings) any provision of an Act passed before this Act or in the same Session, or an instrument made under such an Act before 1st April 1996.

(5) Subsections (7) and (9) of section 54 apply in relation to this section as they apply in relation to that section.'—[Mr. Gwilym Jones.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendments Nos. 72, 105 to 109, 73, 75, 83 and 84.

Mr. Jones: We have tabled the amendments at this late stage because we wish to take account of the provisions of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill currently being considered in Committee. The amendments make provision in respect of the Lord Chancellor and of functions in connection with magistrates courts, justices of the peace and so on. The Bill currently provides for these in clauses 54(4) and (5) together with schedule 2(10).

In addition, the amendments remove subsections (4) and (5) from clause 54, provide a separate clause in respect of the Lord Chancellor and his functions, expand the provisions in schedule 2 and make consequential amendments to clauses 56, 57, 62 and 65.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I am amazed that the Minister can introduce a disgraceful new clause so glibly. The new clause exposes the muddle in which the Government find themselves over various pieces of legislation and the incompetence of Ministers who cannot think through the implications of their proposals. The Minister has given no reason for allowing the Lord Chancellor to take the very wide powers contained in the new clause.

The Minister said that the new clause is meant to take into account the provisions of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill, but the Committee considering that Bill, on which I am leading for the Opposition, has not yet reached the part of the Bill that deals with magistrates courts. As drafted, that Bill is a good deal more limited and does not need the wide and sweeping powers that the Minister wishes to introduce into this Bill.

We need an explanation from the Minister because the new clause provides much greater powers than those provided in the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. The widest of those powers enables the Government, or the Lord Chancellor, to revoke primary legislation by order. That cannot be right. It certainly cannot be right for the Minister to propose such a new clause without offering an explanation or seeking to justify the Government's approach.

In the short time since the new clause was tabled, it has received considerable criticism and caused questions to be asked about the Government's motives and intentions. The Minister has not explained those motives and intentions and has provided no justification for suggesting such wide-ranging powers. The suspicion is that the Government are trying to take powers by the back door under this Bill which would not be provided under the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. It will certainly be a matter for considerable comment when the Committee reassembles to consider that Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), who speaks for the Opposition on matters concerning the Lord Chancellor's Department, will raise several issues at that point.

The Government are seeking to reorganise magistrates courts' functions in Wales without consultation. Even clause 62 of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill, which is the relevant piece of legislation, allows for consultation, so one has to ask what is happening. Is the Lord Chancellor going to climb down over clause 62 of that Bill, which would mean that powers have to be inserted into this Bill in order to enable the Government to make the desired changes?

New Clause 13(4)(b) provides the power to revoke primary legislation by order. We can pray against an order and force a debate in the House, but an order cannot be amended, so the power over primary legislation that is being given to Ministers in the new clause is most unusual and peculiar and certainly requires some explanation by the Minister.

The Government are impaled on their own timetable for local government reform. An attempt has been made to railroad through the measures in Wales and, even on the basis of the slightly slower timetable to which the Government are now committed, there is still not adequate time to deal properly with all the issues.

Let us consider the magistrates courts areas that the Government are proposing. The Government propose three magistrates courts committee areas to replace the four that we now have. The proposed areas form some pretty odd clusters. It is proposed to merge South Glamorgan with what are referred to as the Glamorgan valleys—basically, Rhondda, Pontypridd and Cynon valley. That area is not quite the old East Glamorgan as outlined in the legislation when local government was last reformed. Once again, the Government are in a muddle. I do not in any case believe that it is sensible to make such an amalgamation. The communities of South Glamorgan and those in a part of what is now Mid Glamorgan have their own characteristics and interests, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friends will wish to say something about the specific concerns of their areas.

Bridgend is currently part of Mid Glamorgan, but the Government propose to bolt it on to West Glamorgan. There is no rhyme or reason in that proposal, but they intend to go ahead. Ministers will be given powers without being required to offer consultation. Why are the Government proceeding in this way?

Merthyr and Caerphilly are being put with Gwent. In view of the borders now being discussed, it might be that the Caerphilly and Rhymney valley area should be put with Gwent for the sake of some functions, such as policing. If so, there should be an element of coterminosity with the magistrates courts areas. I can understand the arguments for that, but not in relation to Merthyr. However, the Minister has not even tried to outline the logic of the Government's thinking.

The Government are impaled on their own timetable because they have to make changes to ensure that the magistrates courts' areas are designated. If they are not, there will be no county council to which they can be accountable or to provide the necessary funds. The problem needs to be sorted out within the designated time scale, but, in case the Minister is not aware of this, I must point to him that, as long ago as April 1993, senior officials in the Lord Chancellor's Department were told during visits to south Wales that there was an urgent need to get the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill and the Local Government (Wales) Bill sorted out so that they can complement each other. But last-minute amendments and new clauses are now being introduced on the Floor of the House while the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill is still in Committee. Will amendments be tabled to that Bill in the next couple of weeks or, indeed, on Report, or are the inconsistencies between the two Bills to remain? It is proof of gross incompetence that the two Bills have not been considered together.

I also understand that the question of who is the keeper of the rolls and lord lieutenant are yet to be sorted out. In any event, they need to be sorted out in such a way as to represent the interests of the local communities involved. Local people and officials of the various courts are attempting to find a sensible solution to the problem. There is no need to place in the hands of Ministers the draconian and wide-ranging powers proposed in the new clause.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a great interest in these matters in his capacity as a Front-Bench spokesman for Labour. Is he aware that magistrates and magistrates' clerks in rural mid Wales are frustrated because they do not believe that the Lord Chancellor's Department appreciates the size of rural mid Wales? They feel that they are being forced into amalgamation which may mean that the administration of magistrates courts is difficult to envisage in future. I have received from magistrates many objections to what is being proposed.

Mr. Michael: I am aware of those concerns in rural areas. There is a sense of unity right across Wales on that subject. It is felt generally that the Lord Chancellor's Department does not understand or care and does not want to listen to the views of those involved in the very important task of delivering justice at local level. Criticisms have been made by magistrates through their associations and by many of them individually. Criticisms have been made by magistrates' clerks who have experience of dealing with that administration. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) is absolutely right. He voices the concerns of his area, but, in fact, every hon. Member who represents a Welsh constituency, whether rural or city or valley could stand up and make that point. I certainly accept it as being an accurate description of the problem in many parts of Wales.

7.30 pm

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I wish to restrain the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) from agreeing too much with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery because part of Powys is in the area that I represent. In the past three weeks, representatives of the Powys magistrates court committee have met the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department specifically to discuss the needs of rural Wales and they were very pleased by the reception that they received. They said to me that there was a clear understanding of the problems in mid-Wales and they were given various reassurances.

Mr. Michael: I understand the hon. Gentleman's need to try to make the Government whom he supports look reasonable and to suggest that they are listening. If there were reasonableness and listening, there would be no need for the new clause. The hon. Gentleman must be listening to some strange sources, because that is certainly not what I hear from people around the country as they express their concerns. The hon. Gentleman, having made his point, has now lost interest.

We need to know from the Minister why those powers are required. Is it right that, in a Bill dealing with Welsh local government, power should be given to the Lord Chancellor to change primary legislation by order, rather than through a proper process? Is it right, when a Bill dealing with magistrates courts is on its way through the House and still has to be dealt with in Committee, that such powers should be sought during the Report stage of a Bill not dealing with magistrates courts issues? Is it right that Ministers should fail so clearly to get their act together and that they should seek powers to enable them to sort out the muddle without listening to the voices of those who deal with justice, those who live in the areas affected, those who are magistrates and those who deal with the administration of justice?

There has also been considerable criticism of clause 62 of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill because it is felt that there has not been adequate provision for consultation. Yet here we have something in an entirely different Bill which does not even allow for the extent of consultation allowed in the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. There is considerable concern that the Government's wish to reduce from 105 to between 50 and 60 the number of magistrates courts committees is being driven forward without regard to the interests of those areas that will be affected. Justice in a magistrates courts context is a local issue and a local matter. The commitment of magistrates in giving their time voluntarily to exercise judicial responsibilities in their local communities is not being respected by the Government. That has led to enormous ill feeling. The feelings of those volunteers should not be disregarded in this way.

I cannot see any justification for the Government's seeking the powers in the new clause and I certainly cannot see the justification for their disregarding the proper processes not only of consultation but of legislation in this way. The Minister should recognise the constitutional impropriety of the new clause, withdraw it and let any amendments be made in a considered way in the Committee considering the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. That would give Welsh Members an opportunity, during the Report stage of that Bill, to consider any provisions relating to Wales in the context of what is happening to magistrates courts generally and to deal with the matter in a more responsible and considered way. This is not the way in which to deal with such important issues. I hope that the Minister will withdraw the new clause and accept the points and criticism that I have made.

Perhaps the new clause and amendments have not been drafted by the Welsh Office but have been thrust on an unwilling Minister. I should be happy to hear the Minister say that, and say that, on reflection, he is willing to take them back and see whether he can get more sense out of the Lord Chancellor's Department than his light-weight introduction to the new clause suggested he has been given so far. Certainly, Opposition Members need a lot more answers before we can feel anything but uneasy about the proposition before us.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sorry to have to comment in this way about the Under-Secretary of State for Wales because, in Committee, we appreciated the patience with which he sought to explain the Government's position on various issues, even when the case was weak, but, in this case, the way in which he introduced the new clause was an insult to the House. We watched him. He had half a page of an explanation which he read out head down and which, clearly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) said, did not come from the Welsh Office. He did not explain the origins of the new clause and he did not give us reasons for it or go through it and explain it to us.

In introducing any new clause, it is a Minister's responsibility to explain why one subsection says this and why another subsection says that. I hope that in his winding-up speech he will produce a slightly longer explanation and interpretation of the new clause.

We have just heard a tirade in the winding-up speech of the Secretary of State about centralising tendencies. I can think of no more centralising language than that written into the new clause. In the opening paragraph, it states that the Lord Chancellor may by order make various changes, as he thinks necessary, in certain "matters". Those "matters" include the functions of a justice of the peace —not only the areas of jurisdiction, but the functions. What are the functions? Why in the Local Government (Wales) Bill [Lords] is there a provision for the Lord Chancellor to be able to alter and change the functions of a justice of the peace? I understand that the Lord Chancellor may need power to try to change the areas and to make them coterminous.

The Justices of the Peace Act 1979—I went to the Library earlier when I saw the new clause—refers, of course, to the counties. The magistrates committees are county based and the Justices of the Peace Act incorporates the counties. I understand the necessity to change that legislation when one is doing away with counties or altering the boundaries. But will the Under-Secretary explain, before we approve the clause, why the Lord Chancellor will need the power to alter, as he may think necessary or expedient, the functions of a justice of the peace in a Bill on the reorganisation of Welsh local government?

Secondly, I turn to what I thought was the purpose of the clause. Subsection (3) states:

> "The Lord Chancellor may by order alter, in such a manner as appears to him expedient in connection with the alteration in any local government area . . . any of the commission areas in Wales specified in section 1 of the Act of 1979."

That provision gives the Lord Chancellor power to change the areas or to relate them to changes in local government reorganisation in Wales. The reason why we are so profoundly concerned—my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth made the valid point—is that the clause includes no provision for consultation in any shape or form. Perhaps that consultation provision is in another Bill. My hon. Friend is an expert on the Bill and he may tell us why a consultation process has to occur.

The reason why I shall not support the power suggested in the new clause is that I do not believe that the Lord Chancellor understands or knows about the geographical problems and the areas of the communities that he serves. If he were aware of those problems, he would not have produced the proposals with regard to the reorganisation of magistrates courts committees. The proposals conflict with the changes at local level proposed in the Bill. It is suggested that Merthyr should be included in Gwent.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: From my discussions with my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, I understand that the map that was produced, which has led to the comments made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), contains indicative, not specific, proposals.

[Mr. Jonathan Evans]

The indications given to the delegation that I took to the Lord Chancellor's Department were that the Department currently does not have a specific view on the new areas.

Mr. Rowlands: I am willing to accept the word "indicative". The proposals are indeed indicative of the Lord Chancellor's knowledge and understanding of the communities that we represent. They show how little he knows. It is clear that he has no understanding of geography or community. If he had such an understanding, he would not have produced his indicative map which proposes that Merthyr be included in Gwent.

As the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) will be aware, I supported with elan some of the changes made by the Government in Committee. It is clear that changes in local government boundaries place Merthyr in the Mid Glamorgan preserved county area. They do not carry it across into Gwent.

The proposals come from the Lord Chancellor. In new clause 13, the Lord Chancellor wants to take power by order to alter and amend areas and boundaries. If that is indicative of what the Lord Chancellor understands about the geography of our communities, the last thing that we should do is give him such sweeping powers in the knowledge that his Department is, by its nature, a very central Department which does not understand such matters.

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend asked me about the difference between this Bill and the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill with regard to consultation. In clause 62 of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill there is a requirement that, before making an order in exercising his powers, the Lord Chancellor shall consult "(a) the magistrates for each of the existing magistrates' courts committee areas to which the order relates,

(b) the magistrates' courts committees to which the proposal relates, and

(c) every interested authority."

What is being sought in this Bill seems to override that.

If the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) is correct and what we have are not even proposals for consultation, but just an indicative first stab based on nothing very substantial, goodness knows what we can depend on in terms of consultation.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend underlines the point forcefully. When the Minister replies to the debate, he should tell us why new clause 13 does not contain a form of words equivalent to that in clause 62 of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill when the Lord Chancellor exercises the powers that we are being asked to give him.

It is very difficult for us to relate the new clause to another Bill that is still in Committee and which has yet to return to the Floor of the House to be approved by the House. If a consultation process exists in one Bill, it should surely exist in the context of the powers that the Lord Chancellor is seeking in the new clause. That difficulty underlines the Minister's total failure to explain the new clause to us properly.

The Minister must tell us why the new clause does not contain a provision for consultation such as that in the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. He must also tell us why the Lord Chancellor is taking power in a Welsh local government Bill to affect the functions of a justice of the peace.

I am uneasy about the proposal because the other thing that is behind all this is the mooted huge rationalisation with regard to the local benches. From Tudor times, the development of the concept of the justices of the peace has been based on local justice. With the limited powers available to them, a group of local justices would be able to administer justice in communities of which they were members. Community is basic to the concept of a justice of the peace.

I believe that in many cases, the local benches will be merged. They will be rolled up into one large bench. For example, the local commission of peace currently administered through Pontlottyn may eventually end up in Cardiff. That is the other agenda. The concept of a local bench will be removed. The bench at Pontlottyn is currently manned by people who perform amazingly valiant service to the local community. They have a real understanding and feeling of the nature of the problems of the community. In many cases, they handle the issues with great sensitivity. I do not want those benches to be rolled up and to serve from Cardiff.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): While I largely agree with my hon. Friend, does he accept that magistrates increasingly face threats of intimidation when they sit on local cases in their areas? Some provision must be made to ensure that that intimidation does not undermine justice in that community.

Mr. Rowlands: I have not come across such sad symptoms too often, although I can think of a particular incident in my own community.

I am not talking about a sympathetic bench. In many cases, we want a bench to be firm and strong in its attitudes in respect of some of the anti-social behaviour that sadly occurs in some of our communities by an increasing minority. However, when people come before local benches, in Pontlottyn or Merthyr, that bench should be manned by people who understand and know that community and—as is almost entirely the case in our area —who live within that community.

Behind the proposals in the Bill, the other rationalisation that will be driven through is that with regard to the merger of the benches. We would lose the essential local community character of a magistrates court which I thought was the very reason why we have a system of local justices of the peace.

Mr. Michael: I agree whole-heartedly with the basic principle that my hon. Friend is enunciating. I suggest to him and to my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) that the problem should be dealt with not by merging benches or creating great anonymous areas, but through the provision which already exists by which, where appropriate, a case can be heard by a bench outside the area concerned. My hon. Friend the Member for Gower was right to highlight the problem, but that can be dealt with already under the existing arrangements.

Mr. Rowlands: As always, my hon. Friend, who has immersed himself in these issues, enlightens us and I thank him for that.

We should not approve the new clause until the Minister has explained the nature of subsection (2)(a) and why we should give powers to the Lord Chancellor in a local government Bill to alter the functions of a justice of the peace. Because it is indicative of what we think the Lord Chancellor might be up to, and because the map to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor referred reveals geographic ignorance of our communities, we should not give such powers to the Lord Chancellor without the inclusion of proper statutory consultations in the new clause.

I should like a reassurance from the Minister about the parallel agenda. I should like him to reassure me that my fear about the merger of the benches, which would destroy the very nature of community justice represented by the commission of the justices of the peace, is unfounded.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I seek just two assurances from my hon. Friend the Minister. As I read the new clause, it is clear that it is dependent upon being in consequence of any of the provisions of the Bill. Therefore, I take it that it is intended that one deals with magistrates courts areas —jurisdictions, if one likes—precisely in accordance with the changes that we have brought about in terms of the boundaries of local government within Wales. I have no doubt, particularly because we see in subsection (3) that that phrase is again repeated in relation to changes necessary that that is why the new clause has been brought forward.

"in connection with the alteration in any local government area"

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman is a lawyer; therefore, we need to pick his brain. Why are the words "the functions or" included, if that is his interpretation of the purpose of the new clause?

Mr. Evans: I do not want to make the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister; no doubt he will tell us. It seems that any changes in the functions would have to be changes that were "necessary or expedient in consequence of" the passing of the Bill. It is not therefore not quite the sort of broad power to which the hon. Gentleman was referring.

Mr. Michael rose—

Mr. Evans: Again, I do not want to be lengthy about this matter.

Mr. Michael: Does the hon. Gentleman agree, however, that allowance is made in the Bill for subsequent changes, which could be not just now but at times in the future, and that that in itself could lead to a consequential peg on which to hang changes which of course could be consequential, because it is not we who define "consequential"?

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman made his own speech. It will be for my hon. Friend the Minister to answer for the Government. I am just seeking assurances from the Government; I am not here to give assurances to the Opposition. On my previous point, though, I seek the assurance that my interpretation of the new clause is correct. On the face of it, it seems to be directed in that way.

I mentioned in an intervention that I had a meeting with the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department precisely because of some concerns about the indicative map that has been produced in relation to Powys. It was clear that that document was produced merely for indicative purposes and that it is not a template of change as far as the Lord Chancellor's Department is concerned. In view of some of the remarks that have been made, it is important to make that point.

One point that I put to the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on that occasion and which officials had not previously heard, but promised to give some attention to, is whether, in the passage of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill, there should not only be consultation on new magistrates courts boundaries, if there are to be amalgamations, but consideration of the possibility that any amalgamation might be subject to an affirmative resolution within the House. I know that that matter is currently being considered by the Lord Chancellor's Department.

I seek the assurance from my hon. Friend the Minister that, by passing this new clause, which I am perfectly happy to do, we will in no sense restrict any change that the Lord Chancellor's Department may subsequently agree in terms of the Police and Magistrates Courts' Bill requiring there to be an affirmative resolution before there could be any amalgamation of magistrates courts areas generally.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We have had a kind reference to patience. Perhaps that quality is still needed in the debate. I must tell Opposition Members that the powers to change areas and functions have been in clause 54(4) since it was first introduced. As I listened to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), I tried to make up my mind whether it was a case of much ado about nothing or of the hon. Gentleman being excessively cautious. Knowing the hon. Gentleman as I do, I prefer to think that it is the latter.

It is a pleasure to welcome the hon. Gentleman back to the Opposition Front Bench on Welsh affairs. It is good to see him there. We had been wondering whether we would see much more of him in that position in future, but I had better not digress further.

Mr. Michael: I thank the Minister for his welcome. It is because of the mixture of judicial and criminal justice issues and local government issues that, with well-known tolerance, my colleagues in the Welsh team have invited me to contribute to the debate. I am grateful to them for that.

Can the Minister point to the place in the Bill where subsection (4)(b) of the new clause was previously put? That is the bit that gives the Government power to amend primary legislation by order.

Mr. Jones: I will cover that point in a moment.

New clause 13 provides my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor with the equivalent powers that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has in clause 54. Subsection (3) of the new clause will provide the Lord Chancellor with the ability to make further orders with respect to commission areas, petty sessions areas and magistrates courts committees in connection with alterations made in local government areas by the Bill. That is necessitated by the fact that, for the moment, as far as possible the status quo is to be preserved. The expanded sections inserted into schedule 2 by amendments Nos. 83 and 84 will ensure that those areas are based on preserved county areas. They are currently based on the county area. However, subsection (3) of the new clause will enable my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor, should he consider it expedient in future, to alter those areas to match them with the new principal areas.

[Mr. Jones]

Perhaps I should explain further some of the other amendments. Amendment No. 73 will tie my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor into clause 62 and give him equivalent powers to those of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Amendment No. 75 will bring the new clause into force on enactment. Amendments Nos. 105 to 109 are consequential, to take account of new clause 13.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister has not yet explained to us the consequential changes made by the Local Government (Wales) Bill to the functions of a justice of the peace.

Mr. Jones: That is an important point. The points made by the hon. Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Cardiff, South and Penarth are essentially all for my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor. All that these amendments do is to allow him to alter those areas because of changes to local government boundaries made by the Bill.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about functions. There is nothing novel about the amendments. There is the precedent of section 19(2)(d)(i) of the Local Government Act 1992 which provides power to make regulations and to make consequential, supplementary, et cetera provisions as to the functions or areas of "any justice of the peace, stipendiary magistrate, coroner or keeper of the rolls".

We have to be able to change those, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said, so that magistrates' boundaries tie in with unitary authority boundaries. The problem arises purely and simply because the areas are defined by reference to counties. If my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor made changes to functions, it would have to be incidental, consequential, et cetera, to the local government changes made by this Bill. It is thus not a completely unfettered power to change functions.

Mr. Rowlands: I understand that, but will the Minister give an example of the type of function—as opposed to area—that is changed by the local government reorganisation?

Mr. Jones: They are functions entirely consequential to the changes made in the Local Government (Wales) Bill. I hesitate to give examples of functions, as I am not an expert in that matter, but I imagine that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth will pursue certain expert questions when the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill is considered in Committee.

Mr. Michael: The trouble is that we cannot pursue this legislation during the Committee stage of the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill. That is why I said that these amendments should have been made to that Bill and not to this Bill. I invite the Minister to respond to my hon. Friend's request by giving us just one simple example of a function that might change. The Minister suggested that I might have some expertise. I cannot think of one function that could or should be changed. One is therefore bound to be suspicious and to ask what the Minister and the Lord Chancellor are up to.

Mr. Jones: I shall not go any further on that point.

I trust that that will also be the assurance that my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) has sought. I am grateful to him for his intervention.

In answer to the question by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, the equivalent of subsection (4)(b) of the new clause is clause 54(2)(e). Again, there is nothing novel about that.

I was glad to hear the earlier intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor, which he repeated in his remarks, about the way in which mid-Wales has been considered in arrangements for that part of Wales. That practical example is the best response to the legitimate concerns expressed by Opposition Members about consultations.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sorry to keep interrupting, but this is the Report stage of the Bill. Has the Minister made it clear to the Lord Chancellor's Department, by the usual means, that the proposed map—and especially the notion of putting Merthyr into the Gwent committee area—is completely in conflict with the whole shape and character of local government changes as proposed in the Bill?

Mr. Jones: I regard the map as essentially a matter for my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor. Within the usual consultations, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has taken, and will take, the opportunity to offer his comments so that the eventual decision is best informed and the right decision is taken.

8 pm

Mr. Michael: With the leave of the House, I shall reply. A moment ago, the Minister said that clause 54(2)(e) provided the powers which are contained in new clause 13 with regard to the Lord Chancellor. However, clause 54(1), which contains the appropriate designation, refers only to the Secretary of State and clearly refers to consequential requirements for applying, amending, repealing or revoking legislation as a result of the Bill going through —that is, matters relating to local government, which is what the Bill is about. It does not in any sense make the type of provision that is in the new clause with regard to magistrates courts or the functions of the Lord Chancellor's Department.

It is clear that the Minister has been placed in a difficult position, perhaps as a result of taking on board amendments to help the Lord Chancellor's Department. I suggest that he is wrong in what he is saying. He should withdraw the new clause and let the Lord Chancellor get the Under-Secretary of State to propose amendments to the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill so that the matter can be debated properly in Committee and on the Floor of the House on Report, rather than rushing the amendments through in this way. The Minister is wrong in what he says.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am relatively confident that I am not wrong in what I am saying. Neither clause 54(2)(e) nor clause 51(4)(1) is changed by this group of amendments, although running through the amendments is a process of putting the Lord Chancellor in the same position as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I do not feel able to comment on what amendments may be tabled in Committee on the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill, but I am sure that the right amendments will be tabled where necessary.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 14

AREA COMMITTEES: SAFEGUARDS

'.—(1) Where an area committee has been established by a council in accordance with an approved decentralisation scheme—

(a) the council shall not, except with the agreement of the committee, abolish the committee or alter any arrangements in force with respect to the committee which were made in accordance with the scheme as originally approved or which have subsequently been agreed with the committee; and

(b) nothing in section 101(4) of the 1972 Act (power of local authority to exercise functions otherwise discharged by committee) shall be taken to authorise the council to exercise any functions which are to be discharged by the committee, except as provided for by the scheme.

(2) Every decentralisation scheme shall include provision, to be given effect to by the standing orders of the council concerned, for the majority required in order for any suspending resolution to be passed to be such majority greater than a simple majority as may be specified by the scheme.

(3) In subsection (2) "suspending resolution", in relation to a decentralisation scheme, means a resolution to suspend any of the arrangements in force with respect to an area committee established in accordance with the scheme.'.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following: Government new clauses 15 and 18.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 27, page 20, line 38, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 22.

Government amendments Nos. 54 and 55.

Amendment No. 1, in clause 28, page 22, line 4, leave out from beginning to

'end of line 12 on page 23.

Amendment No. 25, in page 22, line 34, leave out

'sections 102(3) of the 1972 Act (Power to include persons who are not members of the local authority concerned)' and insert 'section'.

Amendment No. 26, in page 22, leave out line 42.

Amendment No. 27, in page 23, line 4, at end insert—

'(f) an area committee may co-opt additional persons to serve as members of the committee, but such persons shall not have the right to vote on any resolution of the committee.'.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The amendments and new clauses represent our response to the views expressed by hon. Members in Committee about the organisation of area committees once they have been established. The deletion of provisions from clause 28 and their replacement by three new clauses, each dealing with a different aspect of the matter, is intended to facilitate reading and understanding.

New clause 14 for the most part reproduces the safeguards for area committees that were built into the clause as it stands. However, it has a new provision which adds a further safeguard in that it disapplies section 101(4) of the Local Government Act 1972—relating to the power of a local authority to exercise functions otherwise discharged by a committee—except as provided for in the scheme. Altogether, we believe that the safeguards will enable committees with the necessary degree of independence to be created and ensure that they can be abolished, their functions changed or their decisions overturned only with their agreement.

New clause 15 fulfils our commitment to provide for the co-option of additional persons to serve as members of an area committee. We all agree that it will be useful for committees to be able to call on the expertise and experience of people who are not members of the committee by virtue of their having been elected from the area covered by the committee.

The new clause also makes provision for an area committee to arrange for the discharge of any its functions by a local authority other than the authority which made the scheme—if authorised to do so in the decentralisation scheme. That will enable an area committee to discharge a service delegated to it in the same way as a full council might exercise that responsibility. In practice, we expect that power to be used mainly to enable area committees to arrange for community councils to discharge certain of their functions for them.

Mr. Wigley: There are two matters on which I should be grateful for the Minister's response. First, will the co-opted members of an area committee count towards a quorum? Secondly, will the Minister confirm that the area committee can be a unit in its own right for the purposes of language schemes under the Welsh Language Act 1993?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I can certainly confirm the second point. Of course, it will depend on the committee's decision. As for a quorum, I should have thought that it must comprise the voting members of the committee, and the co-opted members would not be taken into account for that purpose.

Mr. Alex Carlile: With regard to the second point raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), will the Minister explain how a body that has no legal status whatever, as was confirmed in Committee, can be a unit for the purposes of Welsh language schemes? If a body can be a unit for the purposes of Welsh language schemes, why can it not be a unit for the purposes of making contracts and incurring legal liability?

Sir Wyn Roberts: We went over this ground at considerable length in Committee. When it comes to the question of languages and the provision of a translation service, I should have thought that a committee of a council could take its own decisions in such a matter. That would certainly fall within its purview as a committee because, after all, it is to do with the committee's procedure.

Mr. Rowlands: Pursuing the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), will the Minister tell the House whether any of the amendments and new clauses clarify the legal liability and the legal personalities of the area committees? The Minister is absolutely right in saying that we went over the matter in Committee. As a result, we found confusion and muddle in the Government's mind and in their attitude towards the whole subject of area committees. Will the area committees be liable for their own actions?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am continuing to describe the committees. If the hon. Gentleman bears with me, I shall explain further what the new clauses do. They supplement clause 28 considerably in that we are adding new clauses.

New clause 18 clarifies the position relating to the setting up of sub-committees of area committees and the exercise of the responsibilities delegated to them. The clause also provides for co-option of additional persons to sub-committees, to serve as members.

Our proposals in new clauses 15 and 18 for co-option to area committees and their sub-committees fulfil—I believe—the undertakings given to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) in the Standing Committee. In the light of our new clauses, I hope that he will be able to withdraw his amendments.

Mr. Ron Davies: With the greatest of respect, the Minister is describing the provisions in new clauses 15 and 18, which we can all read and understand. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asked very pertinent and precise questions and the Minister said that he would deal with them in a moment. There is nothing in the new clauses—

Sir Wyn Roberts: No.

Mr. Davies: It is no good the Minister saying no, because he did. He said—I noted it—that he would have thought that a sub-committee could make a decision. It takes a great stretch of the imagination for the Minister to come to the startling conclusion that a sub-committee can take a decision.

I should be grateful if the Minister could answer the question asked by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. Can an area committee take a decision relating to a language scheme or anything else that is contrary the declared policy of the principal council? That matter is important in defining the relationship between such committees and the principal councils and is at the heart of the new clauses. The Minister should deal with that question rather than going into the realms of waffle.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I thought that I had dealt with all the interventions to the satisfaction of those hon. Members who intervened, but I shall say more about the quorum. It is common sense that the establishment of a quorum in a body that has voting and co-opted members is a matter for the voting members to sort out.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) amplified the question on the language issue raised by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) by asking about a situation in which there was conflict between a committee and the main authority. Again, those are matters that should properly be covered by the scheme for decentralisation that the authority will submit for our approval.

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have not forgotten the point made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney.

Mr. Ron Davies rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have a number of points to pursue, too.

Mr. Ron Davies: The matter is of central importance. We debated it at great length in Committee and the Minister undertook to clarify it. He said that such matters could be resolved under the scheme, but who will approve the scheme? The Minister will do so. If he is asking us to accept the new clauses, we ought to have a statement on the central relationship between an area committee and the principal council. Is the Minister going to approve schemes that give area committees powers to take decisions on matters of policy or administration?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Or money.

Mr. Davies: Indeed, or money. The list is endless. Will the Minister approve schemes under which decisions can be taken that are contrary to the principles or the policies of the principal council? That question defines the relationship between committees and principal councils. Under powers given by the Bill, the Minister will approve such schemes, so what is in his mind? It is no good his saying that he thought that the scheme would cover it. What is he going to do about it?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I shall explain many of the points that are raised, if only the House will be patient.

Let me deal with the issue of co-optees. We believe that members of an area committee should be fully accountable for their decisions and that generally only councillors elected for that area should have the right to vote. We have had to make an exception, however, in the case of representatives of churches that appoint foundation governors of voluntary schools. Under the Education Act 1993, the Secretary of State can direct that such representatives be appointed to committees dealing with education and that they should have voting rights. If an area committee has education functions—we made it clear in Committee that only minor education functions might be delegated—it is necessary for the voting rights of church representatives to be safeguarded as we have done in the new clauses.

Hon. Members have mentioned funding and other issues. The Government propose that the decentralisation scheme should set out how an area committee's budget would be calculated and specify a minimum proportion of an authority's revenue budget to be delegated to the area committee. The proportion would vary from scheme to scheme, depending on the functions proposed for each area committee. Where the whole of an authority was covered by area committees, the minimum amount to be delegated might total one third of the authority's budget.

8.15 pm

The scheme would guarantee the minimum proportion, unless the area committee and the authority agreed that it should move upwards or downwards in the light of experience or changing circumstances. Within the block resources delegated to it, the area committee would set its spending priorities and be able to build up reserves and retain revenue from services for which it was responsible, such as car parking.

On capital finance, applications for supplementary credit approvals—SCAs—would be co-ordinated by the authority, although area committees could play a role.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: If the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow me, this is an important matter and I have not finished dealing with it, as it is not simple.

As I said, applications for supplementary credit approvals would be co-ordinated by the authority, although area committees could play a significant role in preparing bids for their areas. Schemes could provide for area committees to have responsibility for SCA-supported projects for functions delegated to them and could receive an agreed allocation of capital resources for those functions —from basic credit approvals and reserves.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary offered in Committee to consider whether area committees should have powers to influence the levels of council tax. We can see that such powers have their attractions and would reinforce the accountability of councillors to their electors. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State considered the matter carefully, in consultation with colleagues in the Department of the Environment and the Treasury. It has become clear that such powers would involve substantial legal difficulties, which we have been unable to resolve. I am sorry to have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) that, regretfully, we have concluded that we should not amend the Bill on that issue.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: Perhaps, before I return to the question asked by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and touched on by the hon. Member for Caerphilly, I had better give way to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Carlile: I do not want the Minister's reference to car parks to pass without asking him to inform the House what would happen, for example, to the reserve built up from the enormous revenue earned from the Welshpool Smithfield car park? Let us suppose that the area committee put the reserve into a bank deposit account and that there was a fund to spend. Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, under the scheme that the Government are providing, the area committee—even if it wanted to enter into a contract to put up a hut for the car park attendant—could not do so because it would have no power to do so? The contract for the car park attendant's hut, using the area committee's money, would have to be entered into by the unitary authority which might not want the car park attendant to have a hut. Is not that factually and legally correct, and how does the Minister defend it?

Sir Wyn Roberts: We have said time and again that it is a matter for the area committees, and the authorities must draft schemes for the delegation of functions to the area committees. The schemes and the functions delegated will vary considerably, and it is for the area committees and their respective authorities to decide what kind of scheme is acceptable to them within the parameters that I am laying down at the moment.

I know what the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) is after—he wants us to declare that the area committees are corporate bodies. But we have made it clear that they are similar to other authority committees. Committees that exist under the present county council system, for example, do not have the corporate status that he is after.

We are going over matters which were, I thought, dealt with adequately in Committee. I have already made the point that committees of local authorities take decisions now on matters for which responsibility has been delegated to them. No one worries now about accountability or responsibility on the part of those committees.

Mr. Wigley: I did not serve on the Committee and, to that extent, I am perhaps a little bit at a loss compared with my colleagues. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not at all."] That may be the case. What happens if an area committee, by virtue of an act of commission or omission, finds itself in a surchargeable position? Are only the councillors on the area committee are liable in law, or is the full authority?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Councillors are responsible for their own actions. Members of the area committees are also members of the full authority and, therefore, as members of the full authority, they might be liable to surcharge. The co-opted members obviously would not carry the same responsibility.

I also emphasise that, as with the present system where the main authority is responsible for its committee's activities, so it would be under our proposed system. The main authority would be responsible for the actions of the members of its area committees who, of course, are also members of the authority.

Mr. Rowlands: That is an amazing statement. It was prefaced by a lengthy statement describing the enormous power of area committees. The committees could have a percentage of the revenues of the local authority and of the block grants of certain amounts of capital expenditure. Is the Minister saying that, if those funds are misappropriated, are not spent in a proper manner and become subject to a district audit, the principal council becomes collectively liable and responsible?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I want to make it clear that, as with the present system, individual councillors will be responsible under the new system for any erroneous decisions which result in their surcharge.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): It has been four years since we first started thinking about local government reorganisation in Wales. It is certainly three or four years since the Government issued consultative papers, Green Papers, White Papers, Bills of one sort and Bills of another. Here we are at the very last stage of our proceedings in the House of Commons, and we are still muddled, confused and besotted by the question of area committees. I suspect that if the Committee stage and the stages in the House went on any further, the situation would get worse day by day.

Frankly, I think that this is the most disappointing part of the Bill. It has been conceived in haste and as a direct result of the Government's attempt—in the Minister of State's own words in the Standing Committee—to pacify people in the Conservative party, and mainly the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans). Because the Minister could not deliver—or did not want to deliver, for whatever reason—separate unitary authorities in rural mid-Wales, the Government tried to cobble together this area committee nonsense to appease and to pacify.

The problem is that the Government are then visiting on the whole of local government in Wales a confused, unaccountable and badly thought-out system of local government. I wish to speak briefly to the amendments standing in the names of myself and my hon. Friends which would delete the whole area committee part of the Bill. Frankly, I am convinced that anybody involved in the working and running of local authorities in Wales—county councillors or district councillors—will live to see the folly of this part of the legislation.

We have been landed with a two-tier system when the whole purpose of the Bill is to create a unitary system of local government. We might disagree on some aspects of that, but the idea of having a single tier was the attraction which the Government have tried to sell to the people of wales. But as soon as they came to a political problem —a handful of the majority in one constituency in the middle of rural Wales—the whole reform of local government had to be put out of gear.

There might be some sense in it if the Government said that area committees would be placed in all parts of Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who spoke well in the earlier debate, could have area committees in his constituency in Splott, Grangetown and other parts of Cardiff in the same way as there can now apparently be committees in Pembrokeshire, Carmarthenshire and mid-Wales.

Mr. Michael: Or in Penarth.

Mr. Murphy: Indeed. Because the system has been born out of trying to make concessions, only parts of Wales will actually have the benefit—if that is what it is—of area committees. One cannot run a system of local government in Wales unless that system is applicable to all parts. It does not make sense, and it will lead to disharmony and administrative chaos as the years roll by.

The purpose of the Bill is to avoid having to come back here in 20 years' time, or whenever it might be, to change local government all over again. After all, it was just 21 years ago that the former Secretary of State of Wales, Lord Walker, was ultimately responsible for the system that is now disappearing. We may have to come back a damn sight earlier than that if the proposals are put into effect, because they simply will not work.

Look at the confusion behind the Minister's comments about finance. No Department, with all its experts—whether the Treasury, the Department of the Environment or the Welsh Office—could come up a solution to enable the over-complex system of local government finance to apply to area committees. The capping procedures are so complicated and standard spending assessments so difficult to understand that they simply cannot apply to area committees.

The Minister of State's answer on surcharge was totally inadequate. We cannot pass laws that mean that members of local authorities who become members of area committees and put up their hands to vote are not sure whether they will be liable to surcharge. Even worse, if those individuals are members of the parent authority, they may be made liable to surcharge when they have had nothing to do with the decisions of those area committees.

8.30 pm

When we debate Powys, the thrust of the discussion will be about accountability and bringing local government back to the people—certainly to those in mid-Wales, which seems to have been the birthplace of the stuff about area committees. The idea was to maintain community links and civic pride. One simply cannot get anyone in mid-Wales or anywhere else in the Principality enthused about civic pride via an area committee. One has to have a council, with a chairman or mayor, which is properly elected, because only those bodies can attract such civic pride, awareness and enthusiasm. An area committee, or whatever one may wish to call it, is not a council, which is what people require in mid-Wales.

For that reason, the first vote on new clause 11 was designed to give people in every part of Wales the opportunity to decide through a proper plebiscite whether they wanted the proposed new local authority for their area. That is the only way to do it. The only way in which permanence and stability can be given to local government is through the establishment of councils, proper statutory bodies, not the nonsense of area committees, which will satisfy no one. Such committees will not last two years should the Bill reach the statute book this year.

No mention has been made of a possible deadlock. When we discussed Government new clause 13, the Minister referred specifically to safeguards. We want not safeguards but assurances that when there is an irreversible deadlock between an area committee and its parent authority it will be broken. We want to know who will do that. Will it be the Secretary of State, the council itself or some other body such as the proposed new association? Who knows? It seems to me that the possibility of deadlock and conflict between those authorities is by no means remote. We were told that the whole purpose of the Bill was to remove the conflict, deadlock and disharmony that could exist between county councils and district councils.

There are ways to decentralise local government, but that is not what we have been offered. The Minister should consider what his Scottish colleagues have done. The Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill offers workable, sensible decentralisation.

A number of Welsh local authorities have already set up administrative decentralisation schemes for housing and other responsibilities. Let us encourage that. No mention has been made of our community councils, which are properly elected bodies. They could be given more powers and finance to do what is suggested should be the responsibility of area committees. Far more sensible measures than the Bill could have been adopted.

Nothing has been done because the Government want to improve the system of local democracy, create a better one or improve administration. We were offered area committees simply because the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor and others wanted to have a different system of local government in mid-Wales. The Government would not agree with their proposals. Doubtless, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor will talk at length about Powys. The trouble with him is that he wanted it all his own way. He was willing to take all and give nothing. That is why the Minister cannot come up with a solution for mid-Wales. What we have been offered does not represent that solution, and it most certainly does not represent a proper system of local government throughout the Principality.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I shall have something further to say when we discuss the boundaries within Powys, but at this stage I shall confine my remarks to the proposals on area committees. If, as the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) suggested, those proposals were an attempt to pacify me, they have singularly failed, as he will well know.

Throughout our discussions, I have recognised that the Government have made a genuine attempt to create a system in which powers can be exercised at a local level. I have been pleased to see the flexibility that has been shown by the Government and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the many announcements about the functions to be delivered at local level.

As I made clear in Committee, I considered that it was one thing to create to create a system of local government in which we allowed functions to be devolved to area committees or shire committees, or even council committees. It is also important that we should have an accountable system of local government. The hon. Member for Torfaen spoke about accountability. To my mind, the crucial element of accountability is financial. It is for that reason that I have strongly pressed the case for allowing unitary authorities either to be set up within Powys or to establish area committees with real financial accountability. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his efforts to carry that further, but it would appear that he is unable to say anything positive in that regard today. I am bound to say, therefore, that the prescription that we are offered for area committees is flawed to that extent.

I am deeply concerned about the proposals that are contained in Government amendment No. 54, because the number of councillors who are required to trigger a request for a decentralisation scheme is to be raised from 10 to 15. In the House, we often discuss particular difficulties in our respective parts of Wales. Often, there is a degree of generosity between hon. Members, which is not always evident among those on the Front Benches. On many occasions, I have heard the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) talk about adult unemployment in his constituency. I appreciate that difficulty and I do not dismiss it. I have heard the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) also speak about similar difficulties. Whatever our political differences, those difficulties are faced by communities that we know.

In rural Wales, one of our problems is sparsity of population. That is understood even by some Opposition Members. Nowhere is that problem more starkly demonstrated than in the proposal to raise the number of councillors required to trigger a decentralisation scheme from 10 to 15. In the Government proposals for Powys, the number of councillors that they suggest should be elected to represent the whole of Radnorshire is 17. If one is to trigger a decentralisation scheme in Radnorshire, one would have to get 15 of the 17 councillors to approve of it. That proportion is not far short of 90 per cent.

In common with many others in the Chamber, I have been on the hustings in the past few weeks. I do not think any hon. Member present, even the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who may still be drunk with the excitement of his success last Thursday, if I can put it like that, would ever aspire to get a majority of 90 per cent. That is the target set to activate a decentralisation scheme in Radnorshire. I am bound to say that I doubt whether that would be achieved.

Of the other two authorities in Powys, 38 councillors are allowed for in Montgomeryshire under the guidance issued. Of those 38, 15 represents but 39 per cent. of those who are able to form a judgment. I am absolutely sure that, despite all the criticisms that have been made about area committees, Montgomeryshire and Breconshire will request a decentralisation scheme. Although 52 per cent. of the councillors would need to approve such a scheme in Breconshire, 90 per cent. of the councillors would need to approve one in Radnorshire.

How can such an operation work in practice? If a decentralisation scheme is approved in one part of Powys, and Radnorshire, for instance, cannot secure the 15 councillors required, who will make the local planning decisions which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State said in Committee should be decided at a local level? His statement was very much welcomed in Radnorshire, where we have had a number of wind farm applications and people feel that Radnorshire should decide whether those applications should proceed. We foresee Montgomeryshire and Breconshire having a decentralisation scheme so that they can reach such judgments, yet the whole of Powys will decide what should happen in Radnorshire.

What is the answer to that problem? Unless we have the 15 councillors required, we shall not be entitled to apply for a decentralisation scheme under the Bill. That defeats the purpose of the exercise in which we have been engaged.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My hon. Friend is taking a somewhat depressing view of the position in Radnorshire. Given that all 17 councillors would be members of an area committee, would have been elected to represent that area and could be rejected by their electorate, I should have thought that they would all favour an area committee. Incidentally, we increased the figure from 10 to 15 councillors because, with the smaller number, a small, disgruntled group of 10 councillors might put forward an application for area committee status when they had nothing more than a difference with the major authority.

Mr. Evans: I do not make light of that difficulty. The concern has been expressed by some Opposition Members, many of whom believe in neither area committees nor decentralisation. The bottom line of concern here is the fact that mid-Wales does not have the population to reach the figures set in the Bill. We shall be disadvantaged by that. I suggest that, even at this late stage, a proportion of councillors would be a better option for areas with small populations than a requirement for a particular number of councillors.

On the first part of my right hon. Friend's intervention, I know the mood in Radnorshire well. In Llandrindod Wells there is far more positive support for a centralised Powys authority; within the more rural part of Radnorshire, however, people feel that there should be a separate Radnorshire authority, so one should not presume that it will be easy to get 15 out of 17 councillors to vote for a decentralisation scheme. If it were that easy, the Government would be saying that every councillor within an area must approve every decentralisation scheme proposed. In essence, that is what the amendment asks of Radnorshire.

Mr. Wigley: The Dwyfor area could be in a similar position to Radnorshire. Has the hon. Gentleman taken into account the possibility of a non-homogenous party political dimension? That may not be the case in Powys, which is largely independent, but those differences could exist in some areas. A small minority of councillors in one area might want to latch on to the larger proportion to which they belong in the overall authority and use that as a vested interest to block the creation of a district committee.

Mr. Evans: When we discussed those matters in Committee, I had more faith in the part of the Bill that allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to decide whether a decentralisation scheme should be approved. Some people resist granting such powers to a Secretary of State. But in the scenario outlined by the hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State's power would reassure me far more than racking up the requirement of the number of councillors that will trigger a decentralisation scheme. As a result of the amendment, it will be impossible for many areas of Wales to apply for a decentralisation scheme. I should prefer the requirement to be either to achieve a proportion of councillors within an area or to stick with the current trigger and then rely on the Secretary of State to decide whether a scheme should be approved.

8.45 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile: To answer the Minister of State's direct question to me, I am content with the amendments on co-option. In so far as the decentralisation schemes will work, I hope that those co-options will contribute to that.

The Government amendments and new clauses on decentralisation schemes are extremely disappointing, particularly when set against the speech made in Committee on that subject by the Under-Secretary of State. Although the debate was somewhat confused on some legal issues, which remain unanswered, we had the impression that there was a real possibility that shire committees—as we thought they were to be called—would have certain powers relating to taxation. The Government seemed to be considering the possibility that shire committees would have precepting powers or something similar.

I appreciate that the Government are saying that, under the schemes, certain requirements set out are intended to ensure that the area committees have their own part of the unitary authority budget. It is regrettable, however, that there is no statutory guarantee that that will happen. I cannot accept that it was impossible for the Government to include in the Bill criteria applicable to all area committees which would ensure that they have some precepting powers and a legal status. I regret having to return to that point, but it is a key issue on the credibility of area committees.

Community councils have powers to take legal action in certain circumstances and in respect of certain liabilities. Although those powers are exercised through district councils, at least they exist. A community council can write cheques, enter into commitments and has all the trappings of a council. Indeed, it is a council. It can also own land; many community councils own cemeteries, which are often on large amounts of land. In Welshpool, for example, the community council—the town council—not only owns Welshpool town hall but used to own part of Smithfield, which is some of the most valuable land in the town. Welshpool town council has significant property ownership and property rights, and so it will remain.

The unitary authority will have the power to enter into contracts, to sue and be sued and to employ staff and contractors. It will have corporate status. We are told that area committees will have significant powers, but how can those powers have real meaning if the area committee must turn to the unitary authority whenever a decision is to be made involving spending or receiving money?

The car park hut is a good example. If the area committee decides to give a car park attendant a hut, I understand that it will not even be able to sign the cheque, and that the contract with the hut provider will have to be entered into by the unitary authority. In my constituency, there happens to be a company, Presco, that makes prefabricated buildings and might well provide that car park hut, by bringing it down the road and dropping it off the back of one of its lorries as it trundles through town. However, Presco will have to send its invoice to the unitary authority and the area committee will have to ask the unitary authority to agree to pay those few hundred pounds in respect of that invoice.

What about more serious situations? Suppose that an employee—an officer of the council—whose functions are entirely in relation to the area committee, committed a serious act of negligence for which his employing authority was vicariously liable. It might be an act that was approved by the area committee but would not have been approved by the unitary authority had it been consulted, yet the unitary authority is to be held liable for it.

One can also imagine tremendous disputes between area committees and unitary authorities about planning decisions. Suppose that the area committee reaches a planning decision against which there is an appeal. The appeal is heard and the Welsh Office inspector finds against the authority and makes an order for substantial costs, running into tens of thousands of pounds. Is it right that the unitary authority should pick up the bill?

Mr. Rowlands: I have followed the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech closely. Given what the Minister said about the devolved responsibility in relation to share of revenue and block grants, does it not mean that the area committee will have to have an almost fully fledged finance department of its own to conduct those functions?

Mr. Carlile: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. He made a significant contribution when we discussed those issues in Committee. I have to say, and I am sure that he shares my view, that none of our doubts has been resolved by what has been said today. The Government have fought and fought to avoid making the right decision, which was to create the unitary authorities in mid-Wales. For reasons that can be only political, they have decided not to do so, but, at the same time, they have managed to displease their own side. We are left with an extraordinary mess.

I suspect that I speak for councillors who are members of the existing Powys county council and for those who are members of the district councils when I tell the Minister of State that councillors in rural mid-Wales do not find it easy to understand the way in which those area committees will work.

Perhaps the Government would really like those area committees to wither on the vine. Here we come to Government amendment No. 54, on which, Madam Deputy Speaker, I hope that we can be given the opportunity to vote separately at the appropriate time in our considerations tonight. Government amendment No. 54 was carefully avoided by the Minister of State when he introduced the group of amendments, but it is extremely important. In many ways, it is the most important part of the group. The fons et origo of an area committee is that resolution of councillors to have an area committee. For reasons that have not been explained by the Minister, he referred to some renegade councillors. I shall discuss that later.

It has been decided to increase by 50 per cent. the number of councillors who can ask for an area committee. The effect that that will have on old counties such as Radnorshire has been graphically, adequately and fully explained by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans). As for the renegade councillors, I thought that it had been repeatedly emphasised, both in the Bill and in discussions about the Bill, that it will be for the Secretary of State to decide whether to allow a decentralisation scheme to proceed. If it is a renegade scheme, he will not allow it to proceed, so that disposes of the renegade councillors. It is no argument whatsoever for increasing the number from 10 to 15.

The Government have had years to think about that. Why were we not told in Committee that the Government thought that 10 was not the right number? Why should there be such a dramatic increase? If they want to increase it, why not to 12—a small increase which might cater more successfully for the type of situation that could confront us in Radnorshire?

The Minister is all too sanguine about what is likely to happen in Radnorshire. There are county councillors who honestly believe, and can express those beliefs well, that decentralisation schemes are a non-starter. They do not want them. Some of them are independent councillors and they are very independent-minded. If two of those councillors are elected to the new unitary authority to represent parts of Radnorshire, that is the end of Radnorshire as a decentralised area—and then what happens?

Is the Minister prepared to countenance planning decisions about wind farms for Radnorshire being taken by a planning committee that includes councillors from Montgomeryshire who may be feeling a little nervous about yet another wind farm being proposed for Montgomeryshire and who therefore decide, "Let's shove it over the border into the constituency of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor"? One can imagine Radnorshire being at the deepest possible disadvantage in that situation, in which, if the Minister's promises are delivered, Montgomeryshire councillors decide all types of things in their area committee and Breconshire county councillors decide matters in their area committee, but everything that happens in Radnorshire has to be decided by all the councillors from Radnorshire, Montgomeryshire and Breconshire.

Earlier in these debates, the Minister of State made an appeal to common sense. In relation to those decentralisation schemes, especially the proposal in Government amendment No. 54, I am afraid that common sense has taken to yogic flying. I ask the Minister of State and the Secretary of State, even at this late stage, to reconsider those proposals, especially Government amendment No. 54, once again. If they do not, we shall have the most unholy mess in mid-Wales, and probably in parts of north Wales, too.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Although the Minister of State has covered a number of the issues relating to decentralisation, many of us still support the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). The decentralisation scheme in the Bill, and in the amendments which strengthen it, are not about decentralisation: they are a recipe for confusion and—despite what the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said—for a continued opt-out by the sections of an authority that remain dissatisfied with an electoral result and with the services that the authority provides.

I am very worried about the negative way in which the Minister of State now intends to strengthen the area committees—a development which has occurred since the Committee stage. Throughout consideration of the Bill, the Government have maintained that they want to do away with a two-tier system of local government. Yet the establishment of area committees will continue to impose on ratepayers and service receivers of many Welsh authorities precisely that two-tier system. The proposals will continue the confusion of responsibilities as between the committees and the unitary authorities. There is still no clear separation of powers and responsibilities in the system.

There will be unclear lines of accountability, too. There will be a patchwork of services in certain areas simply because people who are not satisfied with the composition of a unitary authority will opt out of it. I am not against decentralisation in principle; it is a sound idea. But the proposed system will ensure that dissatisfied councillors can appeal to the Secretary of State—originally 10 of them, now 15.

In an authority such as mine, the proposed Flintshire, a small number of councillors will be able to opt out, perhaps as soon as two or three weeks after an election for a shadow authority in which members of the authority were soundly defeated. Areas such as mine need cross-subsidisation between the industrial belt and the rural belt. But 15 out of 70 or so councillors in Flintshire, perhaps in part of the rural area, could opt out by applying to the Secretary of State for Wales, possibly taking with them a large part of a budget which is likely to have been generated by the whole borough. People throughout the borough have needs that should be met, and a small number of people representing only a small part of the borough should not be able to impede that.

Local accountability for the provision of services will not be clear. For instance, an area committee may be surcharged and all the members of the unitary authority may face a surcharge along with it. New clause 14 will make matters worse. The unitary authority will have little or no control over what the area committee does. The Government new clause states that a unitary authority "shall not, except with the agreement of the committee, abolish the committee or alter any arrangements in force with respect to the committee which were made in accordance with the scheme".

To all intents and purposes, then, the area committee will be a separate legal entity—but its actions can have an impact on members of a unitary authority, who might have to pick up the financial tab for actions taken by the area committee, even though the authority has no responsibility for the committee's actions—it has no influence over the committee at all.

In several areas, planning for one, a small number of councillors who have opted out of unitary authority control will be able to take decisions about important services. Do we want 15 out of 73 councillors to be able to blow holes in district plans long since agreed by the unitary authority, subject as those 15 will be to all sorts of local pressures? These planning matters will no doubt be important to the 15 local councillors, but they may have no relevance to the borough's strategic development plans in respect of education, rural areas and transport. That will clearly not be in the interests of the borough as a whole, yet the unitary authority will have no influence over what an area committee does.

There will also be a lack of co-ordination across a borough. In Flintshire, I want a coterminous unitary authority that acts in the interests of all its ratepayers, but that cannot happen as long as 15 Conservative, rural or Labour councillors can opt out and determine the priorities of their own area merely on the basis of what they think right for it. Why create a unitary authority system if one is to perpetuate, as the Minister is, that element of the two-tier system? There will be about 114,000 people living in my local authority. Why will 15 members be able to opt out and go their own way in a whole range of areas? That is not in the interests of the borough as a whole or of the people whom those 15 councillors represent. It is a recipe for confusion, lack of accountability, potential fraud, and for legal cases galore, which will keep many a lawyer in business for many years to come.

Although the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery—perhaps even the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans)—would welcome that, at the end of the day, I feel that the system will not work. It will not deliver the services that people want. It will not provide a coherent strategy for a geographical area. It will not lead to effective Government. Surely the Bill is about effective Government.

I am concerned about co-option, which the Minister mentioned earlier and which features in the new clause. If we are to have co-option of individual members to a small local area committee, I should like to hear from the Minister a little more about the responsibilities of those individuals; for example, how they are accountable for the services, who they can be, and how they fit into local government. Under the provisions of the Bill as drafted, and with the proposed new clauses, individuals who, by providing themselves with a smaller area committee, effectively opt out of local authority control, can draw from that local area, not just other councillors, perhaps from outside the area, but individuals who are now co-opted, who are not in any way accountable to the services and to the ratepayers who are covered by that area committee, and yet are, perhaps, appointed by a small number of people as opposed to a large unitary authority as a whole.

What we are seeing is not decentralisation, but an opting-out of a wider view of local authority services, and with an area committee comprising a small number of councillors determining what they see as best for that small geographical area without a view to the needs of the unitary authority or the community as a whole. For those reasons, the Minister should go back to the drawing board, accept the amendments that have been tabled in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen, withdraw the new clauses and let us have a decentralisation system that will work and is not a recipe for disaster.

Mr. Llwyd: I echo the words of the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson). By definition, there is a conflict between the members of an area committee and the full parent authority, because, clearly, they will wish to do the best for their district. In Committee, we heard the area committee being transformed into a shire committee, which was meant to lull us all into a false sense of security.

Mr. Rowlands: Pacify us.

Mr. Llwyd: I am reminded that the word "pacify" was used. It did not work. We were supposed to think that we were in line for something worth while, but when one looks at what we are being offered, one sees that it is worthless. It is a half-baked, half-hearted idea, and is a good example of policy on the hoof.

I refer briefly to one or two assurances that were given by the Under-Secretary of State during the debates. He said:

> "The case has been made for shire committees to be responsible for a wide range of functions, much wider than those carried out by present district councils. Finance follows functions, of course . . .
> For example, all the schemes for a particular authority might provide that a minimum of one third of the authority's budget should be delegated to the shire committee."

Later, he said:

> "It should be possible for schemes to establish arrangements whereby shire committees would have responsibility for administering supplementary credit approval-supported projects for functions which have been delegated to them and receive an agreed allocation of capital resources for functions delegated to them."

Finally, he said:

> "We are looking forward to the greatest practical level of decision-making by the shire committee. In line with the estimate that I have already given and leaving aside education, we foresee about 65 per cent. of the decisions on functions and finance being determined by the shire committee.—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 10 May 1994; c. 384-86.]

Much of that now seems to have evaporated. Having heard the Minister of State open the debate, I am now less happy about those assurances than I was when I first heard them.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Let me correct the hon. Gentleman. I listened carefully to his quotation from the speech made by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in Committee; I repeated the greater part of that in the assurances that I gave earlier this evening.

Mr. Llwyd: If the Minister is in the mood to intervene, perhaps he will enlighten me on a certain point. Why has the number of councillors who would have to call for the area committee risen from 10 to 15? Will the Minister explain that again, briefly? Is there any other reason for it, apart from the "rogue councillor" idea, which I consider rather preposterous? If the Minister explained now, it might even shorten our proceedings.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have already explained. We want the applications for area committee status to be soundly based and to relate to local identity and community loyalty. We do not want the kind of development to which the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) referred, in which a group of councillors who are out of sympathy with the unitary authority say, "Let us break away and form an area committee." I believe that that is less likely to happen if the number is fixed at about 15.

Mr. Llwyd: With respect, I do not accept that argument for a moment. I think that there is a good deal of mischief behind the new clause. Meirionnydd's area committee is now likely to have 21 members, or possibly 22, 75 per cent. of whom will have to decide whether to move in. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) is faced with what is potentially an even more difficult problem: if one or two rogue councillors in Radnorshire decide that they do not want an area committee, they can dictate the position for the rest. That, surely, is not an exercise in good democratic practice.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman forgets that members of the area committee will also be members of the unitary authority itself. They can have two for the price of one, as it were. I cannot imagine circumstances in which area members would refuse an area committee.

Mr. Llwyd: In that case, why are we arguing about figures? If no one is going to argue against the establishment of an area committee, why are we wasting good parliamentary time arguing about whether the figure should be 10 or 15? We are getting nowhere. It is like swimming in treacle.

I am dissatisfied with what the Minister has said. I think that the proposal is potentially mischievous; it will not help Brecon and Radnor, Dwyfor, Meirionnydd and various other parts of Wales. I have always thought that the legislative process is about making laws that will not be challenged day in, day out in constitutional courts and so forth. Here we have a potential problem that may blow up and— as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) suggested— prove to be a recipe for the whole idea to wither on the vine.

The hon. Member for Delyn made the general point that when we embarked on the Bill we were considering doing away with two-tier government, which allegedly caused confusion, complications, delay and unnecessary tension. In its stead, we are now creating a similar position involving much more confusion. We do not know what the precise legal position on contracts will be. I shall not go over the argument again, but we are even more confused now and I am sure that, regrettably, things will get worse.

In Committee, we called for clarification. Before it sat, I wrote to the Secretary of State about the matter, which was of personal interest. I still say that unitary status for Meirionnydd, Montgomery and Brecon and Radnor is the answer. The Government's attempt to head off the rebellion and pacify the people of mid-Wales is an ill-thought-out, knee-jerk reaction. The people of mid-Wales will not be pacified by the Government's half-baked plan, and in making that point I am sure that I speak for hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Clause 27 is a half-baked proposal. The Government have said that 95 per cent. of housing management must be put out to compulsory competitive tender. The guidance states that area committees will not be allowed to manage housing direct service organisations.

9.15 pm

Reference has been made to the Powys pudding. I presume that responsibility for social services will be divided between the two tiers— the unitary authority per se and the area committee. The committees, therefore, will be responsible for some services, but will have no control over financing, staff or property resources. If a committee is not a legal entity, it cannot be responsible directly for those matters. A service will not be delivered unless the committees are in control of such major responsibilities.

If area committees are established— if they are baked a little more in the oven— they will have a thankless job. Councillors will stand for election and will merely say, "I am sorry, but I am unable to produce that for you because of what the parent council said. It holds the purse strings; therefore, I am not in a position to deliver anything." I urge the Minister to think again. I always think that it is a gross mistake to introduce legislation that has inherent problems.

I have talked about whether area committees should have 10 or 15 members. I am still not persuaded and I urge the Minister to consider the matter again because it will undoubtedly cause problems in rural Wales.

The financial provisions should be strengthened. We have heard that various formulae will be used, but I am not sure what will ensue or whether the Secretary of State will approve any application. The conundrum that we are all in highlights the fact that, apart from Meirionnydd, the mid-Wales authorities, as approved in Committee, should be allowed to stand in their own right.

The Government are the authors of their own misfortune. I do not like to suggest that the legislation bodes ill, but I am certain that many problems will result throughout Wales because of the ill-thought-out way in which the proposals have been presented. Once more, I urge the Minister to apply some common sense to the situation and to allow Brecon and Radnor, Montgomery and Meirionnydd to have their richly deserved unitary status. The alternative is half-baked, will not work and is a Pandora's box.

Mr. Hain: I do not wish to offend the Minister because we are all quite fond of him really, but I must say that what we have witnessed is an extraordinary tour de force of fudging, fixing and fiddling: the more he spoke, the more contradictions emerged. He would have been better advised simply to read out the brief provided by his officials, keep his head down and not take any interventions because the more he elaborated, the more contradictions he uttered.

Let us consider the question of surcharging. If I have interpreted the Minister's comments correctly, it now seems that if, as the result of a decision taken by an area committee, a surcharge falls on the whole council, individual councillors are liable to be surcharged.

Sir Wyn Roberts: That is not the position that I outlined. The surcharge falls on the individual councillors involved in taking the decision, whatever it may have been.

Mr. Hain: Is the Minister saying that although the corporate body—the whole council—may be surcharged, individual councillors cannot be surcharged as a result of an area committee's decision? Will he confirm that definitely?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Clearly, cases have to be dealt with individually, but the fundamental principle of surcharging, in so far as it affects individual councillors, is that it is related directly to decisions that they have taken as individual councillors.

Hon. Members: Or failed to take.

Mr. Hain: Indeed. That is a grey area, but many other matters raised by the Minister are not at all grey.

What started off, in the Minister's notorious words, as an exercise in pacification has ended up as an exercise in obfuscation. We are recreating a two-tier system of government—precisely the system that the Bill was supposed to abolish. I am not a believer in reincarnation, but the Bill is simply an exercise in legislative reincarnation. Having been killed off, the two-tier system is now rising up in a different form.

Assuming that amendments Nos. 54 and 55 are accepted, one of the most obnoxious features of the Bill is that, on the whim of 15—previously 10—councillors, a section of the council can effectively opt out. That will have the extremely deleterious effect of preventing local authorities—the new unitary authorities—from carrying out their functions and exercising democracy. Opting out and fragmentation will result in decisions that will negate the possibility of a strategic approach to policy and the ordering of priorities in the best interest of the public at large rather than that of particular sections of the community.

Subject to possible disciplinary action by my highers and betters on Labour's Front Bench, I must admit that I am inclined to accept amendments Nos. 54 and 55 on the basis that they appear to me to be wrecking amendments. It is unusual for the Government to table wrecking amendments to their own legislation, but to increase the number of councillors from 10 to 15 could severely injure the principle of the area committees, a point made by the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans). I am therefore attracted to the amendments, and I hope that they are accepted. [Interruption.] It appears that my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) will let me off if I vote for them.

The Bill is illogical, especially in terms of the so-called decentralisation proposals. A better description would be "opting-out" proposals. Let us consider the contrast between education and social services policies and housing policies. In education, there will be one syllabus and one approach decided [illegible] the whole of a unitary authority, but it appears that the area committee can determine its own housing allocation priorities. That is illogical because, in principle, there is no difference between delivering housing and delivering education services.

Let us take the issue of planning. It seems extraordinary that an area committee could override or at least contradict the decision of a unitary authority in respect of planning. Consider a thorny local issue in Neath, for example—the question of secure accommodation for young offenders. In this case, West Glamorgan county council took the decision to site some young offenders' secure accommodation in the Neath area—a decision which I happen to support as the local Member of Parliament but which was met with fierce resistance from local people who felt that it was the wrong spot and who had many legitimate arguments. Is the Minister saying—this is my reading of the new clause—that the area committee could override a strategic decision to supply secure accommodation by refusing planning permission in that particular spot in the unitary authority? That is a classic example of the point that I am trying to illustrate. An overall policy with strategic implications not only for that area but, in this case, for the whole of south Wales, could be overridden by part of the authority, objecting to it simply on a parochial basis.

There are many other illogicalities and policy conflicts to which I could draw attention. However, in respect of Neath, Port Talbot and Lliw, without revisiting the arguments in principle about the boundaries of the new authority and whether they are appropriate—I believe that they are not—there will be severe tensions in the new unitary authority between upper Lliw, Neath and Port Talbot. A faction of dissident councillors—either in those areas on a united basis or in parts of those areas—who set up an area authority and opted out, could severely disable the operation of the new authority. Given that the reorganisation is proceeding against local wishes—it is proceeding because the Government are forcing it through—the new unitary authority will have to establish a new basis on which to work together, new trust and a whole new approach towards getting together people who have previously been suspicious of and hostile to each other. Suddenly, the option of an area committee opting out will open up and that will be very dangerous.

The real aim of the new clause is to continue the process that the Government have embarked on and on which they have set their heart—the process of smashing local democracy. That is their task and their aim. They have an obsession with opting out which makes me believe that the real objective and the hidden agenda is to paralyse local government and the new unitary authorities. The Government already have powers to cap them. In some cases—such as that of the metropolitan authorities in England—the Government have abolished local councils because they were doing things to which they objected. They have further disabled local authorities through the processes of opting out, contracting out and the sale of council housing and by preventing them from building new homes. On top of that, they are seeking to fragment and hive off sections of the local authorities. It all adds up to a quite clear prescription for paralysing and disabling the operations of local democracy, especially where it is Labour local democracy and where local people are attempting to implement policies in accord with their wishes rather than the wishes of an extremely elitist, centralising central Government.

Mr. Ron Davies: The debate demonstrates the complete weakness of the Government's position on the Bill. It was absolutely clear in Committee—certainly all hon. Members who represent the Powys and mid-Wales area, including Meirionnydd, and all Opposition Members have made it clear—that the answer to the problem of mid-Wales is separate, unitary authorities for Montgomery, Brecon and Radnor and Meirionnydd. We have made that absolutely clear and we have voted for it consistently.

It is a pity that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) did not vote with us and did not mobilise those Conservative Members, who we are told are malcontents and who are opposed to what the Government are doing and who, we are told—or at least as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor tells the press—are prepared to assist him in his project of destroying Powys. We had an opportunity to do that earlier. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor would have had that opportunity if he had mobilised his people and voted with us. We faced a majority of 31 against us. If the hon. Gentleman had managed to get 16 people to vote with him, he could have had what he wanted, and what we all wanted, which was the opportunity for democratic decisions to be taken by our local authorities. However, that did not happen.

As a consequence, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor has missed out. He has missed the opportunity to have unitary authorities in mid-Wales and he also has a very poor compromise. The Government are insisting on the Powys model. In an attempt to offset the deficiencies in that model which the Government know exist, they have now introduced the system of area committees to pacify, among other people, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor is now the biggest critic of the area committees. He has pointed out the deficiencies in the financial arrangements and in accountability between the principal council and the area committees. As the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) pointed out, with regard to planning, finance and decision making, the whole area is fraught with difficulties.

9.30 pm

I do not say this unkindly because I know that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales was caught out a few times in Committee, but he was absolutely clueless. We asked him about accountability, the district auditor, the ombudsman and surcharge, but he did not have a clue. He promised to consider those points and to come back to us. He has come back in the form of the Minister of State, but the Minister of State has shed no light on those deliberations.

The Minister of State is at least as confused and unsure as the Under-Secretary was in Committee a couple of weeks ago. The Minister of State has been asked detailed, specific questions about what will happen and about the line of responsibility between the supposed area committees and the principal councils, but he has shed no light on that.

Our view is absolutely clear. The answer to the problem is to restore separate unitary authorities and to strike out all the provisions relating to area committees. That is what we voted for in Committee and that remains our position tonight.

The area committees do not resolve the Powys problem. Instead, they undermine what we are told is the central provision of the Bill—the creation of unitary authorities. The Government are undermining Powys. In their botched attempt to achieve a compromise, they are including a mischief in the Bill which could be used throughout the length and breadth of Wales to undermine and to destroy the principle of unitary authorities.

Mr. Rowlands: Is my hon. Friend clear whether the area committees would have to produce service delivery plans? If not, how will unitary authorities provide a service delivery plan when they will not have responsibility for the money or for delivering services in the area?

Mr. Davies: No doubt the Minister of State will shed his usual incisive light on that question. Although I may be paraphrasing in a pre-emptive way what the Minister of State is about to say, no doubt he will say that it is a matter for the principal councils. If an application is made and a scheme is put to him in which the question of service delivery plans is devolved to the area committees and he approves it, that must be a matter for the area committees. That would be the Minister of State's answer and that is the Government's position.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) would rightly point out, we are now being asked to buy a pig in a poke. We do not know what conditions, principles, values or attitudes will determine the Government's approval of the schemes which have yet to be prepared. That is the reality of the situation that we are facing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) suggested that we would take issue with him in respect of amendment No. 54. He said that he was tempted to support that amendment. Amendment No. 54 increases from 10 to 15 the number of councillors required to make an application for the establishment of an area committee. It is clear that the establishment of area committees is an arbitrary invention. The issue was completely mauled in Committee. However, I understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Neath is tempted by amendment No. 54. It will make the establishment of area committees more difficult. However, if my hon. Friend votes for that amendment, he will endorse the principle of area committees. He will be saying that in some circumstances, albeit these circumstances as opposed to those circumstances, he is prepared to endorse the idea of area committees.

Having examined the matter at length, having considered it in Committee and having heard the debate this evening—the Government have had the opportunity to come up with the answers, but they have not come up with one—I am even more convinced that the appropriate thing for us now to do is to strike out the provisions.

I understand the difficulty that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is in. He regards area committees as perhaps an unacceptable palliative, but nevertheless, if that is all that is on offer, I presume that he wants it. Therefore, I can understand why he wants to oppose a measure which will make that more difficult. If he is minded to call a Division, I will not recommend that my hon. Friends support him.

Much as I sympathise with the hon. and learned Gentleman's position, I hope that he will understand that our position is quite clear: if we were to vote on amendment No. 54, either supporting it or opposing it, that would imply a degree of acceptance of the principle of area committees. We do not endorse the principle; we think that the whole thing is wrong. The appropriate course of action was to have agreed our amendment in Committee and entirely deleted clauses 27 and 28.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Very briefly, I am genuinely surprised at Opposition Members' view of area committees. After all, area committees are not dissimilar to committees of main authorities. We are very familiar with them; they include the education committees, planning committees and so on of main councils. Opposition Members know the answers to many of the difficulties that they anticipate, as the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) showed.

This is an attempt to try to meet the community loyalty and local identity that we know exist in many parts of Wales that cannot qualify for unitary authorities of their own. We would be very hesitant about that and about their strength to maintain those authorities. We have gone as far as we possibly can to ensure the delegation of powers. We have enabled such delegation to a far greater extent than is available under the present system, but, of course, much depends on the schemes that are worked out for the delegation of powers to area authorities.

I believe that the schemes and the proposition of area committees will be attractive not only in mid-Wales but in Camarthenshire, Caernarfonshire and Meirionnyddshire because they have the unique feature that they cannot be changed without their consent.

Mr. Alex Carlile: If it is the right hon. Gentleman's aim to ensure that there is as much local involvement as possible and that area committees should provide that, why is he not prepared to say, "Well, perhaps for certain areas, 15 members are too many," and that, therefore, on reflection, as long as 50 per cent. of the members representing that area request an area committee, a scheme will have to be prepared?

I do not think that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans)—I think that he agrees on this point —and I are asking very much when we request such a concession. Surely it is worth a final re-think on that basis if the right hon. Gentleman really wants areas such as Radnorshire to have an area committee.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and others are anticipating a difficulty that will not occur. If there are 17 councillors in Radnorshire—Radnorshire is the smallest area that I can think of where there might be an area committee—I cannot see that the proposition will not be attractive to all 17 councillors, bearing in mind that they are members of the unitary authority as well.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not want to make a speech; I simply want to elicit some information from the Minister. Earlier, I asked a simple question, to which I still have not received an answer. In clause 26 of the Bill, the unitary authorities are given a specific duty to prepare service delivery plans. How will they be able to prepare such plans when they will have neither the power nor the responsibility for delivering the services if area committees are established? Can the Minister explain how that will happen?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Obviously, in so far as the unitary authorities have delegated to an area committee, the area committee will take responsibility for meeting that part of the service delivery plan. There is nothing unusual in that. Currently, we have county committees which are part of the county authority, and there is collaboration between committees and the main authority. We anticipate that that will also occur where we have area committees of unitary authorities.

Mr. Rowlands: In clause 26, the draft proposals for service delivery plans must be prepared by November 1995 —unitary authorities will be putting out service delivery plans before the area committees have been established. They will offer to deliver services and subsequently find that they will not have the power or responsibility for delivering the service plans. They will not even have control over the money. How will that conundrum be solved?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I think that the hon. Gentleman well understands how it will be solved. In so far as the unitary authority delegates responsibility for the service delivery plan, the committee will be responsible for meeting the requirements.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 15

AREA COMMITTEES: MEMBERSHIP ETC.

'.—(1) This section applies where an area committee has been established by a council in accordance with an approved decentralisation scheme.

(2) The provisions of the 1972 Act with respect to arrangements for the discharge of functions by committees of local authorities and sub-committees, and the appointment of such committees and sub-committees, shall be subject to this section and section (Sub-committees of area committees).

(3) Every person who is a member of the council for an electoral division which falls within the area for which the committee is established shall be entitled to be appointed to the committee at his request.

(4) The committee may appoint additional persons, including members of the council who are not entitled to membership of the committee under subsection (3), as members of the committee.

(5) No other persons shall be eligible for appointment to the committee.

(6) In this section, in relation to an area committee, "co-opted member" means any member appointed by the committee under subsection (4).

(7) Where the Secretary of State has given a direction under section 297 of the Education Act 1993 (power to direct appointment of members of certain committees) which applies to the committee and can only be complied with by the appointment of one or more additional members to the committee, it shall be the duty of the committee to exercise its powers of appointment to secure compliance with the direction.

(8) A co-opted member of an area committee shall not be entitled to vote at any meeting of the committee on any question which falls to be decided at that meeting.

(9) Nothing in subsection (8) shall prevent the appointment of a person, in compliance with a direction under section 297 of the Act of 1993, as a voting member of an area committee.

(10) In the application of section 101 of the 1972 Act (arrangement for discharge of functions by local authorities) in relation to the committee—

- (a) subsection (1) shall have effect as if it gave power to the committee, if authorised to do so by the decentralisation scheme, to arrange for the discharge of any of its functions by a local authority other than the authority who made the scheme;
- (b) subsection (2) shall have effect with the omission of the words "unless the local authority otherwise direct" and (in the second place where they occur) the words "the local authority or".

(11) Sections 102(3) of the 1972 Act (power to include persons who are not members of the local authority concerned) and 15 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (political balance on committees) shall not apply in relation to membership of the committee.

(12) The term of office of each of the co-opted members of an area committee shall be fixed by the committee.

(13) Section 102(2) of the 1972 Act (number of members of committee and terms of office) shall not apply in relation to the committee.

(14) In the case of an appointment made in order to comply with a direction under section 297 of the Act of 1993, the committee shall exercise its powers under subsection (12) subject to any provision of the direction relating to terms of office.'.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 18

SUB-COMMITTEES OF AREA COMMITTEES

'.—(1) In this section "sub-committee" means a sub-committee of an area committee.

(2) The members of a sub-committee shall be appointed by the area committee from among persons who are—

- (a) members of the area committee appointed under subsection (3) of section (Area committees: membership etc.); or
- (b) entitled to be members of the area committee by virtue of that subsection.

(3) Subject to subsection (10), a sub-committee may appoint additional persons, including persons who are not members of the area committee concerned, as members of the sub-committee.

(4) No other persons shall be eligible for appointment to a sub-committee.

(5) In this section, in relation to a sub-committee, "co-opted member" means any member of the sub-committee appointed under subsection (3).

(6) Where the Secretary of State has given a direction under section 297 of the Education Act 1993 (power to direct appointment of members of certain committees) which applies to a sub-committee, it shall be the duty of the area committee concerned and the sub-committee to secure compliance with the direction.

(7) A co-opted member of a sub-committee shall not be entitled to vote at any meeting of the sub-committee on any question which falls to be decided at that meeting.

(8) Nothing in subsection (7) shall prevent the appointment of a person in compliance with a direction under section 297 of the Act of 1993 as a voting member of a sub-committee.

(9) Sections 102(3) of the 1972 Act (power to include persons who are not members of the local authority concerned) and 15 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (political balance on committees) shall not apply in relation to membership of a sub-committee.

(10) The number of members of a sub-committee and their terms of office shall be fixed by the area committee concerned.

(11) Section 102(2) of the 1972 Act (number of members of committee and terms of office) shall not apply in relation to the sub-committee.

(12) In the case of an appointment made in order to comply with a direction under section 297 of the Act of 1993, the area committee shall exercise its powers under subsection (10) subject to any provision of the direction relating to terms of office.'.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

New clause 6

FINANCING OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN WALES

'.—The Secretary of State, after consulting the Treasury, shall within six months of this Act coming into force present a report to Parliament on methods to restructure the financing of local government in Wales; such report shall include consideration of—

(a) the feasibility of local government raising a local income tax, or receiving a proportion of the VAT and corporation tax arising from businesses within their area;

(b) a tax placed upon second homes in Wales, the proceeds of which shall accrue to local government; and

(c) the abolition of council tax and the uniform business rate.'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 6 deals with an essential aspect of local government: finance. I tabled the new clause very much as a probing new clause because in our discussions so far on the Bill we feel that the question of financing local government in Wales has not been adequately dealt with.

As hon. Members will see, under new clause 6 the Secretary of State would, within six months of the Act coming into force, report to Parliament on methods of restructuring the financing of local government in Wales. The new clause looks specifically at three aspects: first, the possibility of raising a local income tax and taking a proportion of value added tax or corporation tax within Wales; secondly, a levy on second homes; thirdly, the abolition of council tax and the uniform business rate.

I do not apologise for pressing this matter at this stage, because I had thought that we might be moving towards coherent consideration of local government financing as well as structures when on 5 December 1990 the then Secretary of State for the Environment made a statement to the House and mentioned doing away with the hated poll tax. He made it clear when discussing that tax that he believed that there was an argument for considering the structures of local government along with its financing, which appealed to us very much.

Back in the 1970s, we gave some substantive evidence to the Layfield committee when it considered the financing of local government. In paragraph 3 of our evidence, we stated that finance should not be > "considered in isolation from local government boundary structures or functions . . . we believe all these aspects of local government to be interdependent."

We warmly welcomed the Government's comment in 1990 that they were considering finance and intended to consider structures and functions at the same time.

9.45 pm

Thinking back to Layfield in the mid-1970s, it is worth noting that the committee came out in favour of a local income tax. On page 281 of its report, it stated that local income tax

> "is a feasible source of local revenue for non-metropolitan counties, metropolitan districts, Scottish regions and islands authorities, and possible London boroughs."

If that was possible in the 1970s, how much more practical and possible is that source of finance for local government now, with the move to the computerisation of so much information? If the argument was valid then, it is even more valid now.

Let us consider the pattern in other countries. Many of them source a good proportion of local government revenue from taxation on income and profits. In Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland, Luxembourg, Germany and Belgium, more than 80 per cent. of local authority income comes from taxation on income and profits. My figures are from the late 1980s and may have changed a little during the past few years. That is a far more acceptable means of raising income for local government as it is more progressive.

We all know about the anomalies of the council tax system. It may not be so bad as the poll tax system, but it contains serious anomalies and causes serious hardship. To make the system in any way acceptable, the Government have had to move more and more to financing local government in Wales from the central Exchequer so that only a small proportion of Welsh local government income comes from its variable, independent source of finance—the council tax. I shall give the figures in a moment.

The freedom of local government is eroded if it does not have the financial freedoms and responsibilities which go hand in hand. One of the problems is that if one moves to a system where up to 90 per cent. of local authority income comes from a central Exchequer by way of rate support grant, revenue support grant, or whatever the terminology may be at the time, it enables central Government to put stringent conditions on the money which goes to local government and necessarily takes away its freedom.

Our new clause, which ensures that the Secretary of State will report on other possibilities, suggests that a certain proportion of the value added tax raised in Wales should go, as of right, to Welsh local authorities. After all, the tax is highly geographically definable because it arises at a certain point which, in computer terms, can be cross-coded to postcodes and easily identified with local authority areas. Of the 17.5 per cent. raised in VAT, a certain proportion—perhaps 3 percentage points—should go automatically to local authorities. Likewise, a proportion of corporation tax—10 per cent., or whatever—should go to local authorities.

By ensuring that those proportions of central taxation go to authorities as of right, and by ensuring flexibility in local income tax, we could do away with the council tax and the uniform business rate. There is no doubt that the uniform business rate is a severe burden. It is an overhead which in times of recession can pull down businesses which would otherwise be viable. It is a fixed cost, whereas a proportion of corporation tax—or, if it is a non-incorporated business, a local income tax—is variable with income, so if income goes down it is not a fixed cost which pulls down the whole viability of the business. I believe that those questions deserve attention and that attention should be in the context of the structures, boundaries and functions of local government.

I mentioned the dependence in Wales on grants from the central Exchequer. I shall look next at the council tax as a proportion of the total income of local authorities in 1993-94. We must bear in mind the fact that the council tax is the only independent income that we have of any significance. There may be sundry and miscellaneous incomes, but those are usually very small.

In Mid Glamorgan, the council tax represents only 9.5 per cent. of the total income of the authority. In other words, 90.5 per cent. comes from sources outside that authority, and the freedom of that authority has been severely eroded. The figure in Powys is 12 per cent, in Gwynedd 14 per cent., in Dyfed 14.4 per cent. and in Clwyd 15.2 per cent. The average for all Welsh counties is 12.5 per cent.

With districts, the position is even more grotesque. In the Rhondda, the value of the council tax as a proportion of total income is 5.3 per cent., which means that some 94.7 per cent. comes from other sources. We cannot have genuine local freedom in local government when the variable proportion of the income is greatly limited.

As for the overall position in Wales, the total 1993-94 figures of all incomes for district and counties in Wales combined is £2,452 million, of which the council tax provides £297 million. That emphasises the point.

If 3p of the 17.5p in the pound of VAT came as a right to local government, it would generate about £300 million in Wales. If 10 per cent. of corporation tax came through to local government, it would generate £100 million. A local income tax of something like 4p in the pound—that would be the variable element, because the other two are parts of central Government taxation, although we feel that they should accrue to local government—would generate £400 million. That would give something like £800 million as of right, compared with the figure of just under £300 million which we are talking about now.

That £800 million would be unfettered income and would not be subject to the stringent controls which inevitably must come from a Government who have the opportunity to put conditions on the grants that they pass out. Such considerations should be taken on board at this stage. I believe that it is irresponsible for us to be setting up structures and functions of local government without looking at the finances.

If local government is to provide genuine local democracy, it must have the responsibility and the freedom to undertake policies in line with the needs of any area. Clearly, there are poor areas in Wales and there must be an equalisation function coming through from the central Exchequer, via the Welsh Office. I accept that any variable independent sources of that kind would probably never be more than 30 to 40 per cent. because of the importance of maintaining standards in areas of deprivation.

In allocating grants to areas, there needs also to be a close scrutiny of what criteria are used and what considerations come into play for the allocation to meet the local circumstances. For example, there clearly has to be consideration of deprivation, sparsity and demographic factors in any area and these possibly need to be fine tuned. We are always playing with them, and they are complex in the model that we have at present, but something needs to be done to make sure that money is going by way of equalisation to the areas that really need it, and that areas generally have much greater freedom with regard to their finance.

In moving the new clause and in calling for a report, we are in no way undermining the Bill. The suggested time scale to assemble thinking on the restructuring of local government finance is not unreasonable. If we do not provide for such a rethink in the Bill, the Government will have no other chance to reconsider in depth local government finance in Wales. Given the nature of the Bill, and at this stage in its proceedings, I realise that we cannot do any more than I have suggested, but my suggestion is well worth consideration. The relevance of such a report goes beyond Wales, but it should certainly be considered in the context of Wales.

Given the spirit in which I have introduced the new clause, I hope that the Government will be prepared to take on board my suggestions and will find some positive way to respond.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has rightly raised the issue of local government finance, which was dealt with rather perfunctorily on Second Reading, in Committee, and now on Report.

The new clause presents the Government with an opportunity to reconsider some of the anomalies of the local government finance system. They should consider returning the business rate to local authorities, and in the short term they should certainly examine the number of bands in the council tax. They should, unquestionably, reform the system of standard spending assessments to make them more intelligible. They should also abolish the capping of local government.

I hope that the Minister will be able to answer one specific question about local government finance. It arises from a written answer from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment published in Hansard today. It refers to the remuneration of members of local authorities. We should consider capping in conjunction with the remuneration of councillors. I understand that a letter has been sent to all the local authority associations asking for their views on the Government's proposal to change the way in which members of local authorities are remunerated—and about time, too.

The Labour party entirely agrees with making a change for the better because many people are discouraged from being local authority members because of the appalling remuneration that they receive. If the proposed change means, however, that a local authority has to pay every single penny of the remuneration, that could mean that it is penalised under the capping regime.

Does the consultation process on remuneration apply to Wales, bearing in mind that we are in the middle of a reorganisation? What are the Minister's views about the possibility of capping as a result of the remuneration of councillors under the new proposed regime?

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Other than under a deeply philosophic guise, I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) that this is the right time to introduce a report on the restructuring of local government finance, even if it is designed only to initiate the first stage of such a review. As the hon. Member knows, we are not proposing any changes to local government finance in the Bill. The arrangements will continue unchanged from the current councils to the new ones. I therefore do not think that it is appropriate to pursue this probing new clause and I suggest that the House should not accept it.

I should like to take the opportunity to say that I believe that the council tax has been well accepted by the council tax payers of Wales. It combines fairness with simplicity of administration and it overcomes those aspects of the rates and the community charge that were most criticised. It achieves accountability through a clear link between what councils spend and what local residents pay. In turn, under the uniform business rate, businesses benefit from certainty and stability. Increases in the poundage cannot exceed the increase in the retail prices index and businesses pay rates on a common basis. That has been a great step forward and underlines the desirability of making no change to local government finance.

The hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) asked about consultation and capping. I believe that the consultation exercise would give him the opportunity to pursue his questions. We look forward to studying the hon. Gentleman's detailed views on all those points, which will be taken fully into account when we consider the matter.

Mr. Murphy: With the permission of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Local government in Wales needs an answer on what the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said today. Does that consultation process now apply in Wales? Given that local government is in the process of reform, will our Welsh associations be asked specifically for their comments, and will whatever occurs in England in terms of remuneration of councillors apply also to Wales?

Mr. Jones: Yes, it certainly will. I look forward to hearing the views of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues on those important matters.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That the debate be resumed tomorrow—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Defective Medical Devices

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

10 pm

Mrs. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): This debate is about medical devices such as artificial heart valves and pacemakers, which are life saving and enhance and prolong the lives of thousands of our constituents. One would think, then, that the debate would be about how wonderful those devices are and how we should praise the manufacturers for producing such excellent instruments of health. But it is not, because, tragically, some of those devices go wrong and, as a result of their failure, people die.

The debate is about what we do when those devices fail and how we react to the inevitability that mechanical devices are not, and cannot be, perfect. How we stop them failing is for the technicians and scientists in the laboratories of the manufacturers, universities and research establishments. We should consider what we do when they fail and how we ensure that as little damage as possible is done.

On 24 April last year, my constituent, Mrs. Marian Sheedy, died. The death certificate recorded that she died of cardiac failure, renal failure and mitral valve disease. It did not record that she wore a pacemaker, nor that a year earlier, according to medical notes that I have seen, the pacing wire of that pacemaker appeared to malfunction. At the time of her death, no reference seemed to be made to the role of the pacemaker. It was as if it could have played no part in determining whether she would live or die.

Although nothing can bring Mrs. Sheedy back, her husband, John, is determined that everyone who wears a pacemaker or other device to help him or her live a more active life should be absolutely confident that the devices are of the highest quality, and have been thoroughly checked and monitored, and that the Department of Health has a duty to ensure that that happens.

When Mr. Sheedy came to my surgery to raise his concerns about what was happening, I knew nothing about pacemakers or about the Medical Devices Directorate, which is supposed to monitor the use of pacemakers, artificial heart valves and the like. I was no more a medical or technical expert than I was an expert in Mandarin Chinese. However, Mr. Sheedy had looked after his wife for many years and learned a great deal about pacemakers and their development. Before long, he had explained to me the basis on which they worked. I also knew that a number of manufacturers sold their products to the national health service. The pacemaker lead implanted in Mrs. Sheedy in 1987 was a Siemens type 93.

Mr. Sheedy had written to Siemens after his wife's death, asking about the lead. He discovered that Siemens had issued a warning to the Department of Health in February 1993, some two months before his wife died. It had also warned all the pacing clinicians of which it was aware. I say, "of which it was aware", because, as a result of an answer that I received from the Minister, I believe that not all pacing clinics are listed with the Medical Devices Directorate, the organisation responsible for issuing warnings.

As a result of Mr. Sheedy's investigations, I followed up with questions in the House, which have led me to believe that there is a yawning gap in the communications system between the Department, hospitals and, most importantly, patients. I want that gap to be closed. I want to be assured that when things go wrong, patients are seen as quickly as possible and doctors know what they are looking for and how to fix it.

There are a number of players in the debate. There are the patients and their families, who have been told little or nothing about the devices implanted in them. There are the manufacturers, whose aim must be profit and whose trials and warnings with regard to their products seem to be under little or no scrutiny. There are the national pacemaker database and the national pacemaker registry, which are supposed to be recording the patients, devices, deaths and other important data, but are of little or no use to us because their records are so inaccurate. There is the Department of Health, which, through the Medical Devices Directorate, is supposed to assess the effects of faults in medical devices, investigate incidents and issue warnings, but which, in reality, has little or no power to do anything about it. I want to discuss each in turn, but I shall leave the patients and their families to the end because, to me, they are the most important players of all.

According to the national pacemaker database, there are 12 manufacturers of pacemakers currently selling in Britain, and 10 such manufacturers of artificial heart valves. The House might be surprised to know that there is no guarantee whatsoever that those are the only manufacturers of such devices operating here. Indeed, we have no way of knowing whether other manufacturers are also selling to hospitals and clinics throughout the country.

That is frightening. That devices which have to be, by their very nature, extremely sensitive, costly and for life-saving purposes, can be sold to hospitals without any scrutiny by any organisation, especially the Department of Health, is, I believe, a scandal. Why is that the case? The Minister tells me that it is because the Department will not make any rules about purchasing of medical implants, but simply says that it will

Those of us who are worried about the national health service being finance-led can only speculate that purchasers might go for the cheapest option, rather than check that a manufacturer is registered with the Department, although being registered in itself is not a guarantee that the Department has checked the approved device. Surely it is not beyond the Department of Health's remit to say that such devices must be bought only from the manufacturers on the list. Of course, that would also mean that the onus would be on the Department to ensure that a manufacturer gets on the list only if he has a proven record of quality, expertise and response. I hope that when the Minister responds he can assure the House that the manufacturers about whom we know are all registered under his scheme.

In Mrs. Sheedy's case, Siemens issued a warning in January 1993, which reached the directorate in early February. It, in turn, informed pacing clinics later that month. I make no great issue of the delay in informing clinics, but I should have thought that when a company issues a warning about its own products there can be no reasonable excuse for hanging on, thinking about it and eventually deciding to do something. I hope that the Minister will ensure that in future there is no delay between the receipt of a warning and passing it on.

As it happened, Siemens also warned the purchasers of the devices themselves. One would think that that would have covered everyone, but it does not, because a patient may be fitted with a device in one hospital but may return to a different hospital for follow-up work. At the moment, there is simply no way for Siemens or any other manufacturer to know where patients are being seen. That problem must be tackled, especially as the responsibility is now on manufacturers to inform the Department of any deaths or injuries resulting from faults in their products.

Let me illustrate that with two examples. Mrs. Sheedy was fitted with her pacemaker at King's hospital. It was then suggested that she have her pacing follow-up at Lewisham hospital, our local hospital. When I asked the Minister for names of pacing and pacing follow-up centres, the reply did not include Lewisham hospital. Last week, I noticed that Victoria infirmary in Glasgow was not on the list, so I phoned it up. I asked whether it fitted pacemakers or did follow-up work. The coronary heart unit staff there informed me that they did do follow-up pacing work. They were not on the list. Did they know of Siemens' warning? I doubt it.

The Minister will say that those hospitals are not on the list because informing the database is a voluntary exercise, but that is exactly my argument. That is the gap which I mentioned when I began this debate. Such information must be available to the database by compulsion if it is to be of any use at all. No one in the House or outside can say with absolute confidence that patients have not died as a result of follow-up clinics being unaware of warnings and thus not having acted on them.

In another reply, the Minister said that it was the responsibility of the manufacturers to advise users and purchasers when faults became apparent. Siemens certainly informed the purchasers, but it was impossible for the company to inform users. One of the main thrusts of my argument is that the users, the patients, have the right to know. I believe that some manufacturers might be disinclined to tell them; even Siemens is unhappy that I should be raising the issue because it has said that a media scare campaign would cause stress and concern for others. But the matter is too important to the 80,000 people in Britain who are fitted with pacemakers, and to their families and friends, for them not be kept fully informed of developments.

I want to refer briefly to another device—the artificial heart valve—and in particular to the Bjork-Shiley valve and the case of Mrs. Pauline Judge from West Bromwich. She would be the same age as me, 41, if she were alive. She died in September last year. In 1982, she was fitted with a valve and recovered quite well from the operation, resuming an active life even to the point of going swimming and taking aquarobic classes. She had even begun a business administration class through employment training.

In April 1993, however, Mrs. Judge's health deteriorated—she became dizzy, and so on. On Wednesday 1 September, she was in terrible pain and was vomiting. Her husband Eddie listened for the valve, which gives off a particular sound, and realised it was not working. I shall not go into the details of the tragic minutes that followed, except to say that Mrs. Judge was in the most awful pain and distress, while her husband did all he could to care for her.

What followed was one of the most tragic episodes I have ever had the misfortune to read. Mr. Judge pleaded with nurses, ambulance staff and doctors, explaining what was wrong with his wife, but to no avail. He knew what was wrong, but no one at the hospital appeared to understand the need to get his wife to a hospital with the facilities to care for her. She died at 1.15 am. Mr. Judge and his family believe that his wife's death was avoidable.

Between 1980 and 1983, the Bjork-Shiley valve was recalled three times in the United States because of fractures. In 1985, large valves were withdrawn, and in 1986 finally removed from the market. When the Food and Drug Administration in the United States became aware of the fractures, it first suspended and then revoked export approval for the 70 deg. valve. There is, however, every reason to believe that Bjork-Shiley aggressively marketed the valve abroad, in places such as Britain, during the suspension period. The FDA withdrew export approval in May 1983, yet the Minister tells me that the first departmental record indicating the suspension and subsequent withdrawal of the export permission is dated 15 January 1985, two years after the first suspension.

The phraseology of the Minister's reply leads me to suspect a lack of effort by the Department to find out exactly what was going on with the device in question. That is why I think it is time the Department's relationship with the FDA was put on a more formal footing. There must be more direct and detailed discussions about medical devices and their impact. Then, people such as Pauline Judge might have the opportunity to be seen by a specialist and have a fatal valve replaced.

The last thing I want to say on behalf of the Judge family is that they are still awaiting the coroner's verdict on Pauline's death. I understand the delay is due to waiting for reports of evidence. I feel that the Minister should use his offices, if appropriate, to ensure that the inquest goes ahead as speedily as possible for the sake of the Judge family.

The national pacemaker database and registry are purely voluntary institutions. It is entirely up to hospitals and pacing follow-up clinics to let them know who has a pacemaker and how it is functioning. I believe that the figures that the Department has given me are woeful underestimates of the number of pacemakers in use. How, then, can the Department feel sure that it knows what is going on, or that it can seriously monitor the effectiveness of the devices?

I draw a comparison here with the system set up to approve and monitor new drugs. A study by Social Audit in1992 suggested that the level of serious injury for newly prescribed drugs was seriously underestimated. Among the reasons for that were the excessive secrecy of manufacturers and the voluntary nature of reporting of side-effects by doctors. The comparison is apt. It is absolutely essential that the use and effectiveness of those devices is carefully and properly monitored and that when anything goes wrong, as it inevitably will, there is no delay between warning and caring for the patient concerned.

It has been suggested to me that the debate and the raising of these issues will scare patients and their families unnecessarily. I think that that is a cop-out put forward by those who do not want patients to know what is going on, or who are not prepared to take responsibility for what is happening. In the course of my learning about medical devices, I have been contacted by a number of families of patients from around the country. Every one of them says, "We have the right to know."

I do not for one moment think that this will scare patients. We are talking about people who have had serious heart conditions which have been controlled by such devices. They are all too well aware of their conditions, and their families monitor and care for them, sometimes for many years. They are not people who do not know and understand what is wrong with them. They are entitled to know how the device that is implanted in them is functioning. If it stops functioning, they are entitled to be assured that it will be dealt with as speedily as possible, so that they may go on enjoying their lives. That is not a lot to ask for.

Let me touch briefly on the views of Mrs. Delonnette of Hastings, whose husband's had a Bjork-Shiley implant. She says:

> "I myself feel that if I had known about it, I may have been able to have something done about it sooner, and maybe he would have been saved from such a tragic death."

Then there is Mrs. McGregor of Bradford, whose husband had a Siemens lead, which rusted inside him, and who now can no longer speak or care for himself and needs to be nursed by Mrs. McGregor 24 hours a day. She says:

> "On behalf of those involved in this issue may I offer my husband's and my support in bringing this matter to the full glare of the media."

Then there is Mr. Edghill from Maidstone, who, by happy chance, discovered from my constituent, Mr. Sheedy, that he had problems on his electrocardiogram and that he should have his pacemaker checked. As a result of that check, it was replaced two weeks later. He said:

> "I consider that this situation should never have occurred, and it is plain to me that the explanations given to date need to be brought to the notice of the public."

Or there is Mrs. Earle, another of my constituents, who had a pacemaker fitted six years ago, and who recently found that she was getting breathless. Her GP arranged for her to go into hospital and have it replaced, where she was asked by the cardiologist why she had not been in before. She had to inform him that she had never had her pacemaker monitored in the six years since it was implanted. Surely that is an indication of the terrible lapse in the proper recall of patients in such situations.

Only today, I received a letter from Mr. Bates, also from Hastings, whose pacemaker was fitted in October 1992. It was also a Siemens. It punctured his lung, and he was hospitalised again. Until August last year, he continued to have problems with it. It was not until October 1993 that the matter was finally sorted out. He said:

> "At the time of my pacemaker implant, I was not warned . . . of any risk involved with either the implantation process itself . . . or the device itself."
> I am aged 44, quite a young age to have a pacemaker inserted, and may need to rely on it for another 40 years or more. If some of the problems mentioned on the programme begin to happen, will I necessarily know about them?"
> What technical information is available to patients like myself about the pacemaker and leads which I have inside me?"
> I fully support your call for adequate information, research and monitoring of pacemaker implants".

The database is inaccurate. It needs to be made accurate. The registry is not up to date; it needs to be. The Department of Health, through the Medical Devices Directorate, is supposed to monitor the effects of devices.

[Mrs. Bridget Prentice]

It cannot do so properly in the present circumstances. It simply does not know what is going on and, even if it did, it has no power to do anything about it.

I put it to the Minister that here is an opportunity to fulfil the principles of the patients charter. It is an opportunity to ensure that no one suffers the pain and loss suffered by my constituents and the others whom I have mentioned, without full knowledge of the effect that artificial devices have, their safety record, the manufacturers' commitment to the highest quality, and with the most detailed monitoring of the effectiveness of such devices.

Tonight, the Minister can begin to give hope and reassurance to the 80,000 people with pacemakers in this country, and to the 5,000-plus with artificial heart valves and other devices. He can say that the Medical Devices Directorate will scrutinise every manufacturer of devices for safety, quality and history follow-up and response. He can say that it will work in a formal and productive programme with the FDA, exchanging information as soon as it is known and acting on it. He can say that the directorate will issue warnings to hospitals, follow-up clinics and GPs when that is necessary, and will check that every hospital has acted on those warnings. He can say that he will ensure that the database is up to date, because pacing centres will be obliged to forward information identifying each patient with his or her unique pacemaker number. He can warn patients, as well as hospitals and GPs, so that they know what is going on.

By so doing, the Minister will ensure that he enhances the quality and length of thousands of people's lives. I plead with him to do so.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I can accede to nearly all the requests and recommendations of the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice). We do precisely what she suggested. Although she has criticised the way in which we do it, we are on the same side in trying to ensure that devices are monitored and any problems are brought to the attention of the right people.

The hon. Lady has engaged in a good deal of correspondence with the Department of Health by means of parliamentary questions. I applaud the methodical way in which she has gone into the matter, on behalf of her constituent and the constituents of other hon. Members. I certainly would not characterise what she has done as alarmist; it is very proper to discuss how we can perfect a system of trying to monitor the complicated network of devices that the health service currently uses.

Let me say how sorry I am about what has happened to the Sheedy and Judge families. These are great tragedies. I accept what the hon. Lady said about holding an inquest; I shall look into the matter, and get back to her.

On the whole, people pay little attention to the safety of medical devices until something goes wrong. The hon. Lady was honest enough to say that she did not know much about the Medical Devices Directorate, which is probably one of the foremost such organisations in the world and which we are lucky enough to have in our health service. For example, a pacemaker registry has existed since 1972, funded by the Department since 1977; a heart valve registry has existed since 1985, a breast implant registry since 1993 and a hydrocephalus shunt registry since earlier this year.

The expectation of both health service staff and patients is that medical devices are safe, and the Department of Health puts a great deal of effort into ensuring that they are. Every year, new medical devices and equipment become available that offer improvements in the treatment and care of patients; but new technology brings with it potential hazards that need to be carefully assessed.

The Medical Devices Directorate, within the Department, comprises a wide range of professional and technical experts with extensive experience in medical devices. It is responsible for ensuring that medical devices used by the health service are safe and effective. It discharges that responsibility in four main ways—by being closely involved in the drafting of legislation and safety standards that will form a framework for the control of devices into the 21st century, particularly in a European context; by operating a registration scheme; by managing a programme to evaluate the technical and clinical performance of medical devices; and by assessing adverse incidents associated with those devices, reported by manufacturers and health care users.

The last of those is the most important in the context of the issue raised by the hon. Lady. The investigation of adverse incidents is critical in ensuring the safety of medical devices. We have issued a number of guidance notes to health service chief executives to encourage the reporting of such incidents, and we shall continue to press for it. The reporting of serious incidents by manufacturers is becoming mandatory under EC directives, as the hon. Lady probably knows.

The MDD handles well over 3,000 reports each year, using its scientific, technical and clinical experts—who take advice, where necessary, from relevant specialists in academia, the health service and industry. Where a risk to the safety of patients or users has been identified, advice is issued, in the form of a safety warning, to health service staff. This advice will take into account the nature and use of the device, the likelihood and severity of patient injury and the consequences of any action taken. This may result in the modification of a device, or sometimes its withdrawal from use.

Departmental safety warnings may take the form of hazards notices, safety action bulletins, pacemaker technical notes or direct correspondence from the Chief Medical Officer or other professionals in the Department. Since 1991, 85 hazard notices, 183 safety action bulletins and 18 pacemaker technical notes have been issued.

I mention that because I should like to refute one of the hon. Lady's more exaggerated statements—that the Department does not know what is going on. We closely follow what is happening with medical devices. She has criticised our means of doing so, but we do much monitoring work and will continue to do so.

Responsibility for ensuring that action is taken in response to safety advice issued by the MDD rests with health services— the specialists. It is the responsibility of chief executives to have a policy in place for the dissemination of information contained in advisory notices to the relevant health care professionals. The nature of the action taken in relation to patient management in the light of such information must, however, remain a matter for the judgment of doctors to whom that advice is issued. In all cases, clinical judgment must be exercised in weighing the risk of potential failure of a device against a patient's condition and the additional risks that may result should further surgical intervention be necessary. Such judgment must be made with a full knowledge of the individual circumstances of each patient. It is the clinician who takes responsibility for ensuring that patients receive suitable advice without generating needless anxiety.

Since the action to be taken as a result of safety warnings is a matter for the clinical judgment of a patient's doctor, advice from the Department of Health is issued only to clinicians. The advice is often rather complex and technical— I do not think that it is patronising to patients to say that— and the action taken invariably depends on the particular circumstances of the patient. It is therefore inappropriate for such advice to be given outside the context of a clinician-patient consultation.

I know that the hon. Lady's particular interest is in the reliability of certain pacemaker leads manufactured by Siemens. In the particular case of the Siemens leads, a thorough consideration of clinical and technical issues was undertaken by the Department in conjunction with clinical specialists and manufacturers. Once sufficient information and clarification had been provided, the directorate was able to draft a pacemaker technical note for issue to all pacemaker implanting centres and follow-up clinics in the United Kingdom.

I heard what the hon. Lady said about the adequacy of the registry and about whether the identity of all centres was known. We must keep that matter constantly under review and ensure that we are aware of all centres. The technical note brought to the attention of relevant clinicians important information previously issued by Siemens in an advisory note, which was appended to the pacemaker technical note.

The hon. Lady mentioned delay. I am informed that 14 days, including weekends, elapsed from the moment the documentary evidence was received by the Medical Devices Directorate, following an informal advice some days earlier, to the moment that our pacemaker technical note was issued. I do not think that is undue delay. We are talking about some technical instructions that have to be interpreted by people who make decisions about patients. They are not something that can be rushed out, for fear that decisions will be taken based on the wrong information. I do not think that there was undue delay in the case that the hon. Lady mentioned from January or February 1993.

The document advised clinicians that patients implanted with particular leads should be evaluated as soon as possible. This evaluation would include a specific test to check the performance of the lead. Since the risk of lead failure was calculated by the manufacturer to be less than 1 per cent. after one year, patient evaluation would not necessarily result in lead replacement in all cases. As I have already said, it is for the individual patient's doctor to weigh the risk of lead failure against the risk resulting from further surgery. A clinical judgment must always be made in the best interests of the patient.

I am sorry that I am unable to say more, but I end by saying that the replacement of a pacemaker lead—a possible course of action—is not a simple procedure. The electrode of the lead may be embedded in the heart tissue and, when a lead is replaced, the original lead is usually left in place. There is thus a limit to the extent to which the new lead can be fitted without causing damage to the heart. It is a complicated matter that we must—

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Anglo-Irish Conference

1. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what considerations led to the decision to publish the agendas of meetings of the Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference but not the result of exchanges.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): The intergovernmental conference follows normal practice in these matters. The substance of discussions between Governments is confidential, no agenda being published, but after meetings a joint statement is issued.

Mr. Ross: Surely the Secretary of State would agree that the communiqué which is issued amounts to an agenda to be discussed at the meetings? The people of Northern Ireland are concerned whenever they see, over a period, the vast range of subjects that are discussed, which, in the eyes of many folk, amount to a joint authority. A full minute would allay the fears and concerns of the people of Northern Ireland, so why should it not be published?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I think that the existing practice is the right one. There is a joint statement as to the character of matters that have been discussed and I think that that is the right way to go about it. I believe that the practice is sustained by experience as being wise.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will my right hon. and learned Friend join me in welcoming the warm tributes paid by the Dublin Government in memory of the men who died in the tragic helicopter disaster in Scotland?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Certainly, I accept her invitation to express my warm appreciation of the message that was received from Mr. Spring and, I think, from leaders of all the political parties represented in the House. It was a tragic accident, but its operational effects are being remedied by all four services involved and the work of those fine people is continuing, as they would wish.

Mr. Mallon: The Secretary of State will be aware that one of the functions of the intergovernmental conference is to protect the human rights and civil rights of everyone on the island of Ireland. Is he aware of the thuggish behaviour of many firms in the north of Ireland, including the recently taken over Ulster Farmers Bacon Factory and the recently privatised Northern Ireland Electricity Retail Co. which are offering their employees employment only on the condition that they accept a drop in salary of about £5,000, with no severance pay and redundancy provisions? Can he ensure that, in future meetings of the intergovernmental conference, that element of human rights and civil rights is protected by both Governments?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: That is an ingenious vehicle by which to bring that concern to Question Time. I do not think that it is a matter of human rights; it is a matter—although I am not aware of the individual circumstances—of businesses striving to keep people in employment, but having to have regard to market circumstances in deciding whether they can pay people to remain in employment.

Broadcasting

2. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are his plans to meet representatives of BBC Northern Ireland, Ulster Television, Downtown Radio and other commercial radio stations to discuss broadcasting in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler): I have no plans at present for such a meeting.

Mr. Fabricant: I am rather disappointed about that. Is my right hon. Friend aware how difficult it is for journalists to maintain impartiality, often in difficult and tragic situations? Does he agree that the current position in Northern Ireland is both difficult and tragic? May I ask him to see representatives of the BBC and others, such as Downtown Radio and Ulster Television, and to congratulate them on the impartial and unbiased coverage that they have given in Northern Ireland?

Sir John Wheeler: I know that my hon. Friend takes an informed interest in the work of the BBC. Of course, all journalistic reporting from whatever source—when it is fair, accurate and objective—contributes greatly to the community and to the security situation. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends meet members of the journalistic community in Northern Ireland almost on a daily basis, when often we find a microphone underneath our faces from people seeking comment. We have a very good and warm relationship with them.

Mr. William O'Brien: Will the Minister reconsider his answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant)? There is a need for consultation, especially as it is thought that cable television will soon be introduced in Northern Ireland. It is important for the Minister to impress on any organisation that wishes to introduce cable television that it should consult local authorities and local people fully. Will he think about approaching the BBC about being more generous and being equal with concessionary television licences throughout Northern Ireland?

Sir John Wheeler: Some of the hon. Gentleman's points properly fall within the jurisdiction of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage. In so far as my colleagues in Northern Ireland or I have any responsibility, we are always available to meet representatives of the media industry to discuss any of their concerns that fall within our jurisdiction.

Anglo-Irish Talks

3. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on progress towards securing a resumption of the inter-party talks on the future of Northern Ireland and on discussions he has had with the Government of the Republic of Ireland concerning a constitutional settlement for Northern Ireland.

12. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the current political situation in Northern Ireland; and what recent discussions he has had with the Government of the Republic of Ireland and the political parties in Northern Ireland concerning a constitutional settlement.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Ancram): Bilateral discussions are continuing with three of the main Northern Ireland parties. The Government are also consulting closely with the Irish Government on the preparation of a framework document, which would facilitate a comprehensive political settlement. Our aim remains to return to multilateral talks at the earliest appropriate time.

Mr. McAvoy: Does the Minister accept that there can be no purely internal settlement of the Northern Ireland question and, therefore, that there is a need for a formal, institutionalised Irish convention?

Mr. Ancram: The Government's position has been clear for some time. Any settlement must address the three relationships—relationships within Northern Ireland, those between the north and the south of Ireland and those between the Government of the Republic of Ireland and the Government here. The formula of 26 March 1991, under which talks are currently conducted, made that clear and that remains the Government's clear position.

Mrs. Prentice: Can the Minister give us any idea when the joint framework document will be presented to the Northern Ireland parties? When does he think that the document will be published?

Mr. Ancram: As I am sure the hon. Lady is aware, work is going on between the two Governments on the framework document, which is intended to set out a shared understanding of the elements of a settlement within strands 2 and 3 that have the best prospects of achieving widespread acceptance and support. It is also likely to include constitutional issues. At this stage, it is not possible for me to say when that process will be completed. Some time after it is completed, we shall wish to discuss the understandings with the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Peter Robinson: I should like to press the Minister a little further on the same subject. I wonder whether he has seen The Irish Times this morning, which contains a quotation from Mr. Dermot Ahern, co-chairman of the British-Irish Inter-parliamentary Body. He says that the Taoiseach hopes to finalise the document before he meets the Prime Minister in mid-July. Presuming that Mr. Reynolds finalises the document and it is rubber-stamped by the Government, is it to be issued to the public, so that the people of Northern Ireland may see it, or is it to be given to the constitutional parties or all the political parties in Northern Ireland? Who exactly will receive it?

Mr. Ancram: First, I should like totally to knock on the head the idea that the British Government are going to rubber-stamp anything. The process that is taking place between the Irish and British Governments is to see where we can find a shared understanding on the elements of a settlement that is likely to receive widespread acceptance by the people of Northern Ireland. That process is carried out intensively at this moment and it is not possible to set a time scale for it, but in due course we hope that it will form part of the process of dialogue that will, in the end, lead to a settlement in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Bill Walker: When my hon. Friend discusses constitutional change with the parties in Northern Ireland, will he bear in mind the interests of the Unionist party —particularly in Scotland—on constitutional change? As a former Scottish Office Minister, my hon. Friend will realise what I mean when I say that the interesting election results in Scotland have recently given us cause to have concern about the Union.

Mr. Ancram: I always watch with nostalgia political developments north of the border, but my responsibilities at this time are for political developments within Northern Ireland. There are great dangers in trying to draw analogies between the situation in Northern Ireland and that which exists in Scotland.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Having confirmed that talks with some political parties have been on-going since last September, can the Minister confirm that it is still the Government's position that the constitutional settlement is within the constitution of the United Kingdom, despite the comments of Mr. Reynolds, who may now be having some midsummer madness after his recent Christmas mislongings?

Mr. Ancram: I can make clear to the hon. Gentleman what has been clear all along: there can be no change to the constitutional status of Northern Ireland without the consent of the majority of the people of Northern Ireland. I can go further and say that there can be no settlement under the present dialogue which does not achieve the widespread acceptance of the people of Northern Ireland. There is no question of coercion or imposition, and that is recognised as much by the Government in Dublin as it is by us.

Sir Thomas Arnold: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government of the Republic do not exercise any kind of veto over the progress of the inter-party talks?

Mr. Ancram: We have made it clear that no one exercises a veto and the important talks will proceed on the basis that no single participant can prevent the talks progressing by simply refusing to come to the table. It is absolutely clear that if we are to achieve agreement, it must be on the basis of widespread acceptance throughout the community in Northern Ireland.

Downing Street Declaration

4. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what response he has received from Sinn Fein-IRA following their request for clarification of the Downing Street declaration.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: None. The people of Northern Ireland demand that they desist, permanently, from violence within our democracy; yet, to the revulsion of the people, they continue to murder people and to condone and justify such murder.

Mr. Alton: Does the Secretary of State agree that the biggest single factor now impeding the peace process in Northern Ireland is the massive amount of money which is made by racketeers and godfathers working within paramilitary organisations? If Gerry Adams and the political leaders of Sinn Fein wanted to deliver a peace deal, there would remain a major task in rooting out those who have a clear and vested interest in continuing the violence in Northern Ireland. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that we must renew and redouble our energies and efforts in stopping those mafia-style activities?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I agree that there is a great deal of racketeering to be found on both sides of the paramilitary spectrum. I do not agree that it is the biggest obstacle to the establishment of peace. The biggest obstacle is the refusal of those who resort to violence for political purposes to give it up in this democracy. We take the greatest pains to counter paramilitary racketeering, but I do not agree that our efforts need to be redoubled. We are at the moment doing all that we consider practicable, and we keep that very much under review.

Mr. Bellingham: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, after the clarification which has taken place, there will be no further dealings at all with Sinn Fein and the IRA? Surely they now have a chance and an opportunity, and surely now the process must go on without them.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The process will certainly go on, with or without them. It will only go on with them if they make it plain that they have renounced violence permanently and that they are committed to democratic politics. There is no question of any dealings with Sinn Fein until that has been delivered—none at all. There has been widespread approval all around the world for the comments that the British Government made on the questions which were submitted by Sinn Fein a mere four and a half months from the signing of the declaration. It is now for it to answer a question—when will it give up violence?

Mr. Hume: I express my appreciation to the Secretary of State for the written clarification which he gave in keeping with his wish to leave no stone unturned and to bring a total end to violence in our streets. May I repeat my view that the recent democratic expression of the people was a strong expression of support for the peace process, which is about a total cessation of violence followed by an agreement among our divided people which threatens no section of our people? May I repeat my request and hope that the response of Sinn Fein and the IRA will respect the self-determination of the people of Ireland, north and south, on the methods used?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman said at both the beginning and the end of his question. The interpretation of election results in Northern Ireland is a specialist activity. It seems reasonable to remark that, in the recent election—to the extent that electors might have had the joint declaration in mind when electing people to the European Parliament—a margin of 20 per cent. more people voted for candidates supportive of, or acquiescent in, the joint declaration than for candidates opposed to it.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Opposition welcomed the replies that he gave to Sinn Fein's questions? We particularly welcomed his recognition of its electoral mandate and the fact that the Government of Ireland Act 1920 should be on the table, that no party should have a veto over discussions and that the only condition for going to the conference table is a demonstrable total denunciation of violence. In view of the strong mandate given in the European election to those parties seeking peace in Northern Ireland, particularly that given to my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), does the Secretary of State accept that there is every reason for Sinn Fein to heed the voice of the people of Northern Ireland and the whole island of Ireland, renounce violence and take its place at the negotiating table?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I very much agree that Sinn Fein should heed the voice of the people. In the south it got 3 per cent. of the vote, while in the north it got under 10 per cent. There is no excuse in this democracy for proceeding to use violence for any political purpose whatever. That message is well understood by the people of Northern Ireland, who demand that violence must end. For Sinn Fein to continue to use violence, claiming to act in some way in the name of the people of Ireland, is not only fanciful but fraudulent.

Security

5. Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

8. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his assessment of the current security situation in the Province.

9. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the security situation.

11. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of terrorist activity since 15 December 1993.

Sir John Wheeler: Thirty-four people have been murdered this year as a result of terrorism in Northern Ireland, including five members of the security forces. In the period between 15 December and the end of last year, one soldier was murdered. Many attacks have been foiled by the courage and expertise of the security forces. There will be no relaxation in the determination of the authorities to bring those responsible for terrorist crime to justice.

Mr. Molyneaux: Now that national and international opinion is at long last aligned with democracy and not with Irish terrorism, will the Minister reflect on the views of his right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary who, when Home Secretary, said:

> "There is no point in negotiating with the IRA. They just have to be extirpated"?

Sir John Wheeler: There is no negotiation with the Provisional IRA. The joint declaration sets out a mechanism for those who wish to follow the path of peace. I hope that they will follow it.

Mr. Spring: The western part of Suffolk may be a long way from Northern Ireland, but may I relay to my right hon. Friend the expressions of shock and sympathy addressed to me by many of my constituents following the tragic helicopter crash? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that, despite that tragic setback, the fight against terrorism, from whatever quarter, will continue unabated?

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who seeks to take an informed interest in the security problems of Northern Ireland. The tragedy of losing 29 experienced and valuable people who have contributed so much to saving life is a great disaster and the House will think particularly of their families at this time. I assure the House that, notwithstanding the extent of that disaster, every effort to continue the fight against terrorism will continue. Even now, the replacements are going into office to take up and continue the work of those whose lives have been so tragically lost.

Mr. Taylor: In Belfast last week, the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church was held. That is the largest Protestant Church in Northern Ireland. Views were expressed by many laymen and clergy about the security situation on the ground. As the Minister will have taken them into account, how does he now respond to them?

Sir John Wheeler: I am naturally concerned about all comment in Northern Ireland, but the House should know of the real and considerable successes that the security forces are having. So far this year, until 15 June, 220 people have been charged with serious terrorist offences, as against 172 in the same period last year, including 49 with murder or attempted murder, as against 38 in the same period last year. What matters is that people who commit those awful and evil crimes are caught, arrested and charged before the courts.

Mr. Soley: The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) referred to Irish terrorism in his question. Is not this an appropriate time to remind ourselves that, for the past two years, Unionist terrorism has been claiming more lives than republican terrorism, and not for the first time in Northern Ireland's sad history? Is not it therefore all the more important that we now say to both the Unionist and the republican community in the north, which is where the violence originates, that there is no excuse for terrorism? There never has been any excuse, but there is no excuse in view of the bold and, if I may say so, visionary decision of the two Governments to go for the Downing Street declaration. It has given both sides democratic safeguards and democratic opportunities, if they follow that agenda, and the British and Irish people expect no less from both communities.

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he has said and agree whole-heartedly with his view. Terrorism from whatever source is unacceptable. There is no excuse of any kind. So far this year, 136 so-called loyalists and 83 republicans have been charged for terrorist-related offences.

Sir James Kilfedder: Is the Minister aware that there is growing alarm at the increase in criminality and hooliganism in the North Down area? The people of North Down are entitled to the same security as any other part of Northern Ireland. With regard to hooliganism, there are gangs of youths who travel around and harass, and in some cases terrorise, vulnerable old-age pensioners. Surely it is time to increase the number of police in the North Down area, the number of police vehicles and the number of police stations?

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I can assure him that I take a special interest in the progress of the fight against ordinary crime in Northern Ireland and especially in his constituency, which I had the pleasure of visiting a short while ago, when I was able to speak to the police about their level of clear-up of ordinary crime, which is especially high—often, 40 to 50 per cent.

Rev. William McCrea: Does the Minister understand that the people of Northern Ireland are deeply worried about the deteriorating security situation in the Province, bearing in mind the figures he gave to the House? Also, in a recent debate in the House, widespread anxiety was expressed by many hon. Members across the House that IRA Sinn Fein leader Martin McGuinness seemed to be above the law. In the light of the deteriorating security situation, is not it about time that Martin McGuinness was arrested forthwith and that the due process of law took place—or is he above the law because of negotiations with the Government?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: No one is above the law passed by the House of Commons. All those people who should be properly investigated for alleged crimes will be so investigated. There is no question of anyone being exempted from the criminal justice process as the hon. Gentleman implies.

Anglo-Irish Talks

6. Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what security matters were discussed when he last met Ministers of the Irish Republic; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Such discussions at our meetings take place in confidence, but security co-operation remains a matter of high importance for both Governments.

Mr. Enright: Has the abject failure of the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) in the recent elections —in spite of his vitriolic attacks on the Anglo-Irish declaration he gained less than one third of the votes— strengthened democratically the British Government's position vis-a-vis the Irish Government?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I do not think that the British Government's position can be viewed as one of antagonism towards the Irish Government, although a firm stance is being taken in the current important discussions. Our position is clear: it is based on the principle of democracy. The future of Northern Ireland must be determined only by democratic means. That also happens to be the position of the Irish Government, as is made clear in the joint declaration.

Mr. Forman: In discussing security matters with his counterpart in the Irish Republic, has my right hon. and learned Friend had any cause for optimism about the role that the United States Administration could play in assisting the search for peace and security in Northern Ireland?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I should like to say that there is a close relationship between the security forces of the Crown and their counterparts in the United States. Indeed, I have nothing but gratitude for the across-the-board co-operation that we receive from the American authorities.

Mr. McNamara: When the right hon. and learned Gentleman next meets the Irish Government to discuss security arrangements under the confidence-building measures of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, will he discuss the proposals for the reform of the Police Authority in Northern Ireland, in particular the distinction between security and community policing and the accountability of the Chief Constable to the authority?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am glad to say that I had a most fruitful and successful meeting with the authority a couple of days ago, when very broad support was expressed for the consultative document. We both looked forward to co-operating in the translating of those broad-brush concepts into the appropriate legislative language. From time to time, the relationship of the public to the police and the police to the public is discussed in the intergovernmental conferences and I have no doubt that that will continue.

Criminal Justice

7. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for extending to Northern Ireland the tape recording of interviews and the right of access to a solicitor for suspects; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Wheeler: Interviews with suspects detained under the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 are tape recorded. The Government believe that electronic recording of interviews with detained suspects in Northern Ireland under the Prevention of Terrorism Act would not at present be in the overall interests of justice. The policy will be kept under review.

Access to legal advice is a statutory right for all suspects in police custody.

Mr. Mullin: In the light of all that we know, is it not extraordinary that courts in Northern Ireland are still sending people away for life imprisonment on the basis of confessions which are not recorded, which were extracted at Castlereagh, and to which the interviewees' solicitors have been routinely denied access? Is it not about time that some of the lessons that we have learnt over here were applied in Northern Ireland—and who better to apply them than a Secretary of State who, as Attorney-General, presided over many of the disasters in our own legal system a few years ago?

Sir John Wheeler: I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's last comments and I am sure that the House does not either. Access to solicitors may be delayed for up to 48 hours on strict security grounds. The criteria governing a delay are laid out in section 45. A similar power to delay is also available to the police in England and Wales under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

The court system in Northern Ireland is impeccable. The judiciary is independent and makes its decisions accordingly. As to the use of technology, that matter is kept always under review.

Mr. Trimble: Is it not inconsistent for the Government to allow criminal proceedings to be brought against terrorist suspects on the basis of tape recordings of conversations in the open air while, for the purpose of criminal proceedings, they refuse to allow tape recordings of telephone conversations by terrorist suspects?

Sir John Wheeler: The use of material collected by intercept means and governed by warrant has to be carefully considered and is a matter for the prosecution authorities.

Mr. Stott: The Minister will be aware that Sir Louis Blom-Cooper, the independent commissioner for the holding centres, has recognised the need for proper safeguards to be introduced into the system, and he said so in his recent report. The report from John Rowe QC also suggested that terrorist suspects should be recorded on audiotape. I am disappointed at the Minister's reply. If those measures were introduced in Northern Ireland, clearly in our judgment they would build confidence in the security forces and provide police officers with protection against false allegations of physical and verbal harassment. I am at a loss as to why the Government still refuse to bring into operation these particular measures, which were recommended by their own advisers.

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He raises very important and serious issues with which I have a good deal of sympathy. I am particularly grateful to Sir Louis Blom-Cooper and others who carried out a review of the procedures and their recommendations and advice are treated seriously. Equally, however, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and I have to take into account the advice that we receive from the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, whose chief duty is to prevent the killing and terrorism in Northern Ireland. We must heed his opinion when he raises the importance of maintaining the present structure, but we will keep the matter under review and explore the possibilities to see what may be done.

Surface Links

10. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Commission of the European Union on surface links between Northern Ireland and south-west Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tim Smith): Apart from the correspondence on the electricity interconnector, there have been no discussions.

Mr. Foulkes: The Minister will be pleased to hear that I do not intend to ask about the electricity interconnector but about the decision by the Commission to include Stranraer and Larne in the trans-European network, which I hope that he will join me in welcoming. Has he seen the report in the Glasgow Herald suggesting that the Secretary of State for Scotland is resisting a European Union plan for multi-million pound improvements to the rail link from Stranraer through my constituency to the channel tunnel? Will he meet the Secretary of State for Scotland and try to persuade him to stop treating citizens of Northern Ireland and south-west Scotland as second-class citizens in Europe?

Mr. Smith: I very much welcome the decision to which the hon. Gentleman refers to include the route in the trans-European network. Of course, the railway is important to traffic from Northern Ireland and I will certainly have a word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Gallie: Is my hon. Friend aware of the contract recently signed between Ayr hospital and health authorities in Antrim and Larne, which will bring mutual advantage to my constituents and to those of hon. Members representing Larne and Antrim? Does my hon. Friend approve of such links, and does he acknowledge that improved surface links between Stranraer and Larne will bring much further advantage?

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to hon. Friend for drawing my attention to the benefits of that arrangement.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: If European funding becomes available, will the Minister bear in mind the new industries that he has welcomed to parts of Antrim which are close to Larne? We need not only facilities at the harbour, but facilities leading to the ports so that the traffic can travel that way. I join my colleagues in Scotland in supporting that development.

Mr. Smith: I welcome the inward investment projects to which the hon. Gentleman referred and I recognise the importance of access to Larne port. We hope to upgrade part of the road in 1997-98.

Integrated Schools

13. Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what matters he takes into consideration when deciding to establish an integrated school at post-primary level.

Mr. Ancram: We seek to satisfy ourselves about the potential viability of the proposed school; about its religious composition; and about whether suitable accommodation is being provided. We also examine carefully the overall circumstances of each proposal, including any representations received. Those procedures apply also to primary schools.

Mr. Maginnis: Notwithstanding that we would all, in ideal circumstances, like to see integrated education in Northern Ireland, is it not absolutely profligate of the Government to support integrated secondary schools in, for example, my constituency of Fermanagh for 1 per cent. of the secondary school population when there is already over-provision of between 10 and 15 per cent. in that sector? How does the Minister think that the 99 per cent. of people will feel when they see small schools facing the axe so that money can be given to the 1 per cent. who will be privileged with their own special school?

Mr. Ancram: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, I hope that he will read the paper that I put out yesterday, from which he will see that we are considering options to enhance the quality of education in small rural schools and not to axe them. As to integrated schools, and the one in the hon. Gentleman's constituency in particular, I fully respect his view. The representations that he made to me were given close consideration both by me and by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. However, it is Government policy to encourage and facilitate integrated education where there is proven parental demand for it. It is also Government policy to give parents choice in education where that is possible. In the case of the hon. Gentleman's constituency, both criteria were met.

Ms Hoey: I very much welcome the move towards integrated education in Northern Ireland, but what are the criteria for considering an integrated school? Half the children on the island of Rathlin, for example, are educated in a home tuition unit and the other half in a Church school. Does that situation not present an ideal opportunity to allow the home tuition unit on Rathlin island to become an integrated school?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Lady will have heard me set out the criteria for an integrated school. One is the viability of the proposed school. Obviously we carefully consider any representations made to us, where there is sufficient parental demand in that context.

Peace Process

14. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to be able to announce the commencement of detailed negotiations and discussions on the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) and for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice).

Mr. Shaw: Does my hon. Friend agree that a substantial body of opinion in Northern Ireland, southern Ireland and the United Kingdom is for the recommencement of detailed discussions and negotiations? Will not the time arrive when, if Sinn Fein and the men of violence fail to say that they do not support a continuation of violence, those discussions and negotiations must go ahead?

Mr. Ancram: I agree with my hon. Friend, who properly reflects feeling in both parts of the island of Ireland. However, agreement will not be achieved by artificially forcing the pace, by shouted slogans or blazing headlines. It will be achieved only by a careful and considered advance by all participants towards a common and widely acceptable position which meets the aspirations of the majority of people in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McGrady: As the Minister has declared that he is aware of the intense demand in Northern Ireland for the recommencement of inter-party talks, does he accept that their recommencement and the peace process are not mutually exclusive but could run in parallel? There is a feeling in Northern Ireland of procrastination surrounding the inter-party talks, which are the most meaningful way of establishing peace in the long run. Will the Minister also confirm that talks will be on the basis of the March 1991 inter-party agreement?

Mr. Ancram: I hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say. I am certain that he would agree that, while we all wish to see multilateral talks recommence at an appropriate moment, it would be premature to try to get everybody around a table until the elements for agreement are in place. For that reason, I wish to continue my discussions with three of the four main constitutional parties in Northern Ireland to try to explore further what common ground is available on which we can advance.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Clappison: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the past 12 months this country lost the lowest ever number of days to strikes? Is it not sad that that record is being spoilt by a trade union which, in pursuit of an 11 per cent. pay claim, yesterday inflicted hardship and inconvenience on thousands of travellers and commuters, including many of my constituents in Hertfordshire? Is it not conspicuous that that is not being condemned in any quarter by the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: Overall, our industrial relations record is extremely good, and the number of days lost in strikes is lower than it has been for more than 100 years. We now lose fewer days to strikes than Germany, France or the United States per head of population. As for yesterday's strike, the disruption that was caused to millions of people was inexcusable. Most of the public sector has settled on increases around the rate of inflation. The dispute is over a bid for an 11 per cent. increase before negotiations have even begun about productivity. It is unacceptable, it cannot be right and it should be condemned by every Member of the House.

Mrs. Beckett: Can the Prime Minister confirm that when yesterday his Chancellor ruled out tax cuts he was admitting what the Prime Minister refused to admit on Tuesday—that a second round of tax increases will go ahead next year and will cost a typical British family £800 a year more in tax?

The Prime Minister: I suppose that there must be some occasion on which the right hon. Lady will address the current issue of the strike and not wriggle away from it. If she is so concerned about tax, perhaps she will now withdraw all the public expenditure promises that she and her colleagues have made, and which inevitably would lead to higher taxation in future. If she will not withdraw those public expenditure promises, will she please indicate how they will be paid for and by what amount tax will rise?

Mrs. Beckett: That is twice in one week that the Prime Minister has refused to answer the question. Let us try again. Taxes will go up next year, won't they? Just say yes.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Lady knows the contents of the Budget and knows also that she is wriggling and hiding behind promises that she cannot substantiate. Our tax position is clear and open and people know what it is. We have set out a position that is right for this country and which has brought this country back to better economic circumstances than it has known for many years. That is an honest and straightforward position, unlike the position of the right hon. Lady who makes promises of increased expenditure with no indication whatever as to whether she will borrow to meet them and put up interest rates, or tax to meet them, or break those promises.

Mrs. Beckett: But does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor that those tax increases, and the threat of interest rate increases, are a direct result of the Government's economic failure and their track record of boom and bust? Whom does he think the Chancellor was condemning—Lord Lawson as Mr. Boom, or the Prime Minister himself as Mr. Bust?

The Prime Minister: That was very well rehearsed, but it will not win the right hon. Lady very many votes. As for interest rates, I wonder if the right hon. Lady can remember a time when interest rates under a Labour Government were as low as they have been under this Government for the past 15 months. I wonder if she can remember a time when inflation was as low as it is under this Government now. I wonder if she can remember a time when our growth rate was twice as high as that of our European competitors. The answer is that she cannot—and, under any Labour Government, that would never be so.

Mr. Butler: Does my right hon. Friend recall that the Labour party has voted against every single tax reduction that has been introduced, over many years, by Conservative Governments, and has voted against every tax increase? Does he consider that to be consistency or stupidity?

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that it is the Executive that is responsible to the House, and the Executive that must answer questions, not the Opposition. That is the basis on which our democracy is built.

Mr. Butler: I apologise, Madam Speaker. It was because I was so surprised to be called.

Would my right hon. Friend consider such conduct on the part of his party to be consistent or stupid, had it taken place?

The Prime Minister: The Opposition's position is certainly consistently stupid, and stupidly consistent.

Q2. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mackinlay: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the people are often much more sensible than politicians? If so, has he reflected that last week—not only in Essex, but in a continuous, uninterrupted line from Dover to Oban—his policies were rejected and Labour's were endorsed? Does he not recognise that he is increasingly seen as the captain of the Titanic—carrying on regardless, blaming the iceberg and determined to rearrange the deckchairs while he puts people's lives at risk with his own reckless policies?

The Prime Minister: Well, that was quite an effort. There are certainly occasions on which the public are much more sensible than politicians. They were much more sensible than Opposition politicians in 1979, 1983, 1987 and 1992, and they will be more sensible than Opposition politicians again at a later date in 1996 or 1997.

Mr. Butcher: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the administration of law in this country now protects the civil liberties of yobs, bullies, violent criminals and drug barons so effectively that the civil liberties of the law-abiding majority are endangered? The Conservative party never wanted that, the people never wanted it and the Cabinet never wanted it. If the legal structure is being undermined, should we not find out who the termites are before introducing further criminal justice legislation?

The Prime Minister: I think that it is necessary to look at the interests of the majority of the people in the country. I share my hon. Friend's view: our present criminal justice legislation was formulated with that very much in mind, as were some of the ideas that I have outlined to the House on other occasions.

Q3. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Flynn: Will the Prime Minister confirm that, in support of his campaign for a more civilised Question Time, which I hope is still continuing, and in the hope of a rational reply, 24 hours ago I sent him the following supplementary question: because of his own personal responsibility and his Government's responsibility for introducing and promoting personal pensions, will he now give, in clear and simple language, a guarantee that the millions of people who opted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme and occupational schemes and who have been subjected to bad advice will have all their losses made up and their full pension rights restored?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman may not be quite aware of the present situation. The regulator has made it clear that he will use his powers to ensure that anyone who was mis-sold a pension will have a remedy. There is no need for investors in personal pensions to be too concerned; the hon. Gentleman should have understood that. Within the next few weeks, the Securities and Investments Board is due to publish a full report setting out the terms of redress which should be applied to investors who have been disadvantaged by that advice. They would be wise to wait for that report and not listen to the hon. Gentleman's scaremongering.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that before the national health service reforms there was no such thing as equality of health treatment in this country and it depended entirely on where one lived? If one lived in Lancaster, one received good treatment, but if one lived in parts of the rest of the country, one did not. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, following the reforms, best practice is spreading throughout the land?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm that that is the case. The health reforms are spreading best practice in every part of the United Kingdom and removing many of the anomalies that existed previously. That, and the increased resources available to the national health service, are intended to ensure that we have the best possible national health service for our nation that we can possibly afford.

Q4. Ms Eagle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms Eagle: Is the Prime Minister aware that his Government are currently spending £121,800 a year of taxpayers' money on the salary of the chairman of Railtrack, who works only a three-day week? Is that value for money?

The Prime Minister: If he turns Railtrack into the efficient organisation that customers who use trains wish to see, yes.

Q5. Mr. Duncan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Duncan: Will the Prime Minister convey to the local government commission my constituents' overwhelming gratitude for recommending the return of the ancient and valiant little county of Rutland? Will he hop across from Huntingdonshire and hang a horseshoe in Oakham castle to celebrate that sensible and popular decision?

The Prime Minister: I know from my own experience how strong my hon. Friend's campaign for the return of Rutland has been and I congratulate him on the outcome. He mentioned other counties. I am familiar with one near to Rutland, which I hope will also return. I believe that questionnaires are to be sent to every household, which means that local people will be able to express their views on the matter and on what they wish the outcome to be. That is the right way to proceed.

Q6. Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 16 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hill: If the Cabinet is so bad that it needs a drastic reshuffle, as he promised on Monday, should not the Prime Minister take his fair share of the blame and reshuffle himself as well?

The Prime Minister: In the interests of helping the hon. Gentleman, I can tell him, first, that whereas on Tuesday he told the House that unemployment was up in his constituency, today I can tell the House after yesterday's figures that it is down—and I hope that he is grateful. The words that he metaphorically put in inverted commas—"drastic reshuffle"—have not crossed my lips.

Mr. Lamont: May I urge the Prime Minister at the forthcoming summit in Corfu to reject firmly the candidature of the Belgian Prime Minister for the presidency of the Commission? Even if Britain did not have an excellent candidate with a brilliant negotiating track record, is it not true that Mr. Dehaene is a federalist of the old-fashioned type and that no Belgian candidate would resist the ever-increasing demands of the Brussels bureaucracy?

The Prime Minister: At the moment there are only two declared candidates for the post—Sir Leon Brittan, whom we back strongly, and Dr. Ruud Lubbers. Both are highly respected in the European Community and are well known to all the member states. I have made no secret of my belief that Leon Brittan is the right candidate to be President of the Commission and he will have our strong support at Corfu. At this stage, I am not prepared to declare a position on any other candidate or possible candidate.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Will the Leader of the House please state the forthcoming business of the House?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 20 JUNE—Opposition Day (13th allotted day) (1st part). Until Seven o'clock, there will be a debate on "Reform of Parliamentary Procedure" on a motion in the name of the Liberal Democrats, followed by remaining stages of the Trade Marks Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Insurance Companies (Third Insurance Directives) Regulations.

TUESDAY 21 JUNE—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Social Security (Incapacity for Work) Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Sunday Trading Bill.

WEDNESDAY 22 JUNE—Opposition Day (14th allotted day). There will be a debate entitled "Failure of Her Majesty's Government on Overseas Aid and Development Policies" on an Opposition motion.

THURSDAY 23 JUNE—Debate on "Opportunities for UK Exporters" on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 24 JUNE—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 27 JUNE—Until Seven o'clock, motions on the Ports (Northern Ireland) Order and the Ports (Northern Ireland Consequential Provisions) Order.

Motion on the Appropriation (No.2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 22 June to consider European Community document No. 10635/93 relating to guarantees for consumer goods and after sales services.

[Wednesday 22 June:

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community document: 10635/93, Guarantees for Consumer Goods and After Sales Service. Relevant reports of the European Legislation Committee: HC 48-iv (1993-94) and HC 48-xxi (1993-94).]

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): When is the summer recess?

Mr. Brown: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement and for the Opposition days. I appreciate that it will be possible for us to raise the question of Rwanda during the Opposition day debate, but it would be more appropriate if there were to be a debate on that in Government time. Is the Leader of the House able to tell us that, as things develop in Rwanda, he will be willing to allocate Government time to discuss that?

Is the Leader of the House yet able to give the House assurances about the two key economic debates that are required by the unified Budget process before the House rises for the summer recess? The House will need to know when we can expect the publication of the second set of Industry Act forecasts and we should like to know that we will have a one-day debate in Government time on those forecasts.

When will the Leader of the House be able to announce the date for the one-day debate on individual departmental expenditure plans? We have not had such a debate since 1991.

Finally, when will the Leader of the House be in a position to announce the date of the summer recess?

Mr. Newton: I saw some tension between the hon. Gentleman's opening question and the clearly heard sedentary intervention of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) who asked about the date of the recess. I also saw tension between all the demands for debates and the demands for, no doubt, an early announcement of an early date for the recess.

Although I acknowledge that there is a clear commitment to an economic debate arising from the understanding at the time of the unified Budget, the more that I respond to the requests for debates, the more difficult it will be for me to respond to the last of the hon. Gentleman's requests and the longer into July we will sit. Of course, I shall bear his requests in mind.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the powers and immunities of police officers when dealing with teenage criminals, because many of us believe that it would be far better if police officers had the same powers as parents to administer reasonable corporal punishment, rather than having to drag the young offender before a magistrates court, which hands him over to a probation officer or a social worker, who tells him not to be naughty and gives him a free holiday?

Mr. Newton: I understand why my hon. Friend raises that point and I am sure that, in doing so, he responds to quite a significant amount of public concern that one has heard expressed. However, I am sure that he will understand that I would not feel it appropriate to comment, as a Minister from the Dispatch Box, on the decision taken by the magistrates in the case that he has in mind.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House confirm that there are one or two important outstanding obligations in our relationship with the European Union? Having regard to the recent Government performance in European elections, when will we have debates on the accession Bill, which is required, and the own resources Bill? It may be of some interest to hon. Members sitting behind him.

Mr. Newton: I am not in a position, I am afraid, to give a definite and specific response to that particular request at the moment, although I am aware of the interest in those matters. I shall merely observe in passing that, in view of the results of the elections on Thursday, revealed on Sunday, I am slightly astonished that that point is raised from the Liberal Democrat Benches. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can confirm whether he, too, took a bet on the matter.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Instead of passing more legislation next week, which may be repealed or amended or scrapped by the EC Commission in five or 10 years' time, at great cost to the British taxpayer, will the Minister instead arrange a day's debate on early-day motion 1336?

[That this House, wishing to maintain its tradition of keeping its procedures up to date, and recognising the legal and consequential costs of European Court judgements which oblige the United Kingdom to amend or effectively to scrap legislation passed years ago, and accepting the implications of the fact that loosely worded European legislation does not achieve real clarity until the European Commission invites the Court to determine its precise meaning, believes that it would be in the public and the taxpayers' interest to submit all new Parliamentary legislation before the House of Lords stage to the officials of the Commission of the European Union to establish whether they consider that its contents are in keeping with the various treaties approved by Parliament.]

It suggests that, to save a great deal of money for the taxpayer and trouble and inconvenience, every piece of legislation passed through the House should be sent to the officials in Brussels, to receive their stamp of approval, in order to avoid such ridiculous and costly burdens on the taxpayer as a consequence of the treaties, to which we have foolishly agreed.

Mr. Newton: I always listen with close attentiveness to my hon. Friend, a fellow Member for the county of Essex. However, if he has in mind the accession treaty, I must say that it is a virtually universal desire of hon. Members to see the European Union enlarged in the way allowed for by the treaty.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Will the Lord President accept that there will be great disappointment among my constituents that the order implementing the Government's proposals for the reorganisation of local government in Cleveland does not feature in next week's business? Will he give an undertaking that, when the matter has cleared its judicial review, which I hope will be very soon, the Government will use all their best endeavours to bring the order before the House so that the matter may be resolved and proceeded with before the summer recess?

Mr. Newton: I certainly undertake to bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's representations and, indeed, no doubt, those of others as well. However, I can give no commitment on an exact date at the moment. In a sense, he half-answered his own question by referring to judicial review. It would clearly be inappropriate to proceed while that is going on.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Will my right hon. Friend find time next week for a debate on early-day motion 1330?

[That this House congratulates the staff and management of the Chiltern Line for maintaining rail services to passengers during the RMT strike on Wednesday 15th June.]

It stands in the names of myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan). A debate would enable hon. Members on both sides of the House to salute the dedication and professionalism of the railwaymen who, yesterday, kept the Chiltern line open to travellers, allowing myself and hundreds of my constituents to go about their normal business and meant that, encouraged by their professionalism, many more people used the trains, rather than took their cars to the roads, which would be the unfortunate consequence of the strike-happy attitude of so many Opposition Members.

Mr. Newton: I very much agree with my hon. Friend and I recognise the efforts of the staff on his railway line to whom he referred and also of those who ensured that trains were also running on a number of other lines, including, I understand, those affecting Southend, Barking, Oxford and Worcester.

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange next week for the President of the Board of Trade to make a statement about one of the most well-known British companies—Wedgwood—which is embarking on the expansion of its production facilities in another country? Does not such action fly in the face of the Government's claim that the climate in this country now favours investment? Does not he realise that it is also a savage blow to the economy of north Staffordshire?

Mr. Newton: As it happens, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will be here to answer questions next Wednesday; perhaps the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his point then. For the moment, I can say only that, although the climate for investment in this country—including investment from overseas—has undoubtedly been greatly improved over the past 15 years, it is also important that our firms should be in a position to do business overseas.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Will the terms of the motion for Monday's business be sufficiently widely drawn to enable us to discuss the farce of Prime Minister's Question Time which, after all, only started as recently as the regime of Lord Wilson of Rievaulx?

Mr. Newton: Clearly, I cannot tell my hon. Friend what the terms of the motion will be, because that is in the hands of the Opposition. However, he will be aware of what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said on these matters and that it appeared to win considerable approval from all parties. I also believe that the Procedure Committee gave some consideration to these issues yesterday and has decided to seek evidence from me and my opposite numbers in the House.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): May I draw to the attention of the Leader of the House early-day motion 1276, which is entitled "Atrocity in Kuwait City"?

[That this House welcomes the forthcoming visit to Parliament of U.S. citizen Naim Farhat, whose father and younger brother were brutally murdered in Kuwait City on 2nd March 1991, six days after the allied Liberation of Kuwait, and whose sister Naimat was raped, shot in the head and left for dead; notes that after intense U.S. congressional pressure the Kuwaiti Emirate eventually tried a Kuwaiti police officer, finding him guilty of the double murder and Naimat's attempted murder but insisting that the young woman 'invented' the rape accusation to 'whip up anti-Kuwaiti feelings'; and joins U.S. and international womens and human rights activists in calling for the withdrawal of the smear of false rape allegations against Naimat, the prosecution of the still unpunished accomplices, some of whom are connected to high Kuwaiti personages, full compensation to the family for their horrific ordeal, the disinternment of the dead victims and their re-burial in their home country of Lebanon.]

It concerns the murder of the father and brother, and her attempted murder and rape, of Naim Farhat, who is in the House this afternoon. She is now living with a brother in the United States. Given that the family have alleged that the son of the Foreign Minister of Kuwait, Nasser Sabah al-Ahmed, and the crown prince of Kuwait, Saad Abdullah al-Sabah—both members of a Government returned to power at the point of British guns—are personally involved in the commission and cover-up of the crime, would not it be appropriate for the House to debate next week Britain's close and cordial relations with Kuwait so that justice may be won for this tragically afflicted family?

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Gentleman will understand that the appropriate response is for me to say that the investigation of any such alleged crime is the responsibility of the Kuwaiti authorities, but we have certainly encouraged them in their efforts to bring those responsible to justice.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an urgent debate on education in Kent, in view of the fact that, earlier this week, the Labour and Liberal parties voted to remove representatives of the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church from the education resources sub-committee, thus denying the major spiritual influences in Kent access to influence the economic activity of the education authority?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise to make time for a debate on precisely that matter next week, but I hope that my hon. Friend's words will be considered by those at whom they are directed.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): We are to have a debate on Tuesday on one fairly contentious aspect of social security legislation, but would it be possible to extend it to reconsider benefits for 16 and 17-year-olds in light of the Prime Minister's disgraceful comments about young people begging in our streets, which he made during the European election campaign? Could it also be extended to cover civil rights for disabled people? Both topics emerged as major issues in the run-up to the election, and there is surely a need for the House to debate them.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady well knows that, despite the ingenious way in which she has managed to ask her questions without incurring your displeasure, Madam Speaker, there is no scope for enlarging consideration of Lords amendments to the Social Security (Incapacity for Work) Bill to include such issues.

As for the first part of the hon. Lady's question, it would be interesting to get some answers from elsewhere as to whether Opposition parties intend to return to a regime that would discourage youngsters of 16 and 17 from either staying at school or taking training that is offered to them.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Can my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the conduct of Scottish local government? He will be aware that, under the unusual procedure used to move the writ for the Monklands, East by-election, it will not be possible to raise matters relating to Monklands in the normal course of events because of the way in which we carry out our business.

Mr. Newton: I do not think that I can undertake to provide time for an early debate in view of the amount of time that has already been spent on debating local government in Scotland; no doubt there may be further opportunities in due course. I will certainly consider my hon. Friend's concern that the matters about which he is concerned should be further exposed in the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House agree that there is not a great deal of business left for next week and the remaining weeks in the run-up to the recess? In view of that, would it be a good idea to allocate a day or two for the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, especially in view of the fact that when the House was in recess the Government, the Prime Minister and other Ministers went to Normandy and praised the disabled people who hobbled along the beaches at Normandy and Arromanches? Could there be a more sickening, hypocritical sight than that of a Government praising the veterans of D-day and at the same time kicking their crutches away?

Mr. Newton: I have made comments, as have many others, about the allocation of time and the fact that the House decided the allocation of time for private Members' Bills many months ago, and I do not propose to add to that this afternoon.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Given the huge importance that the presidency of the Commission now has in the national lives of all the EC member states, and given the declaration at the end of the Maastricht treaty committing our partners to a bigger role for national Parliaments, what role will this Parliament have in the appointment of the President of the Commission?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is perhaps implying a view; a view was also expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) during Prime Minister's questions. I think that my hon. Friends are capable of finding ways of expressing their view—and, indeed, have done so.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I ask the Lord President a question of which I gave his office notice this morning? Is there any chance of a statement next week either from the Foreign Office or—better still—the Crown Office about the statements in the court in Beirut of Youseff Shaban to the effect that he put the bomb on Pan-Am flight 103 which blew up over Lockerbie? Can he ask what the Government's response is to that statement, which some of us take with a pinch of salt? Can he also take into account the fact that distinguished Scottish lawyers have said that the whole Crown Office approach to Lockerbie is much too simplistic?

Mr. Newton: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate is satisfied that the evidence available supports the charges against the two Libyan suspects. He has not seen any evidence relating to involvement in the Lockerbie disaster by Youseff Shaban. We understand from the Lebanese judicial authorities that Mr. Shaban made no confession of responsibility for the Lockerbie bombing prior to his reported outburst in court. Therefore, the situation is—I say this straightforwardly to the hon. Gentleman, acknowledging, if I may, his courtesy—that we are seeking further details of that report. If it proves to be relevant, it will of course be investigated. But it will be for the Crown Office and Dumfries and Galloway police to determine what investigation is necessary.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): In considering the earlier request for a debate on industrial relations, will my right hon. Friend see whether it is possible to have wording that is wide enough to deal with not only the unnecessary rail strike but unemployment? This week, we had the good news of another fall in unemployment and the report from Manpower that we have the best employment prospects for four years. All the comments that are constantly being made by Labour Members about full employment suggest that bringing in the social chapter and a minimum statutory wage would be some sort of helpful approach.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestion. It is certainly very striking that, of all the subjects that the Opposition could have chosen for debate on their day next Wednesday, they chose the one that they did. Perhaps it demonstrates even more clearly than before their reluctance to discuss unemployment simply because it is falling and—perhaps even more strikingly—the unwillingness of anyone whose name has been mentioned in connection with the Labour leadership election to utter a word of condemnation, or almost a word of any kind, about the present rail strike.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May we have a debate on election law in the light of the fact that the election was abused in the west country when a Literal Democrat candidate stood. Does not that have implications for the Liberal Democrats on this occasion, but also for other political parties? Surely the matter should be sorted out.

Mr. Skinner: It got the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) £2,500.

Mr. Newton: It is fairly rare that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is helpful to me, but I shall express my gratitude, take his good will and sit down again.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): Given that it is a well-known fact that the Liberal Democrats are all things to all people, can my right hon. Friend confirm that the debate on Monday will be a very wide-ranging one on parliamentary procedures? Will it include the procedures for being elected to Parliament, so that we can look into the problems when someone such as Mr. Alec Kellaway changes party on the eve of a poll? Perhaps it could also give members of the Liberal Democrat party the opportunity to explain their position to the House, as there are rumours that one of them is possibly considering joining Mr. Kellaway in the Labour party.

Mr. Newton: I am beginning to think that there might be a range of interesting issues to be discussed, were I able to make time available. Perhaps that will be of some comfort to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), whose question I did not mean to be quite so dismissive with. It was just that I was left virtually open-mouthed by the friendliness from below the Gangway.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The business that the House wishes to discuss and complete before the recess more than any other is the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill. Time after time, the House has made its opinion clear through a number of different avenues. If Members cannot decide that we will control our business through this House, where are we at? What is stopping us from doing what we want? The Leader of the House should respond to the feeling expressed by masses of hon. Members and should give us the chance to vote through the matter, one way or the other.

Mr. Newton: As I have said on a number of occasions, the House controls the time available for proceedings in such matters and did so through the Sessional Orders that it passed last autumn, at the beginning of the Session. For my part, the appropriate course is for the Government to concentrate, as they are doing very firmly, on introducing what they believe to be practical and workable proposals—unlike those in the Bill—to achieve the aim that we all share, which is to advance further the rights of disabled people.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have a debate next week on the RMT strike last Wednesday and the possibility of another next Wednesday and more to follow, bearing in mind the intense suffering that the strike meant for my constituents, including children who needed to travel by train to take public examinations, whose future depended on their performance that day and about whom the Labour party and others do not seem to care at all?

Mr. Newton: While I cannot undertake to provide time for a debate, I certainly endorse my hon. Friend's remarks about the inconvenience, indeed hardship, caused to many people. In my judgment, like that of all Conservative Members and, probably, privately of many Opposition Members, it is extremely irresponsible of the unions to undertake a series of strikes about an 11 per cent. pay claim.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Reverting to what the right hon. Gentleman said earlier regarding the summer recess, is he aware that Opposition Members are increasingly concerned that we are drifting almost to a part-time House of Commons, with more recesses—not holidays—than are really necessary? We believe that Parliament, or the House of Commons certainly, should remain a full-time place and I would deplore a three-month break. If the right hon. Gentleman is a victim of the reshuffle, will he pass the message on to his successor?

Mr. Newton: I will readily receive the message directed to myself. If what I said earlier was not clear, I shall say that some of the suggestions that I have seen in newspapers about the early date of the recess are far-fetched indeed, and I hope that nobody has booked tickets [illegible] the basis of them.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a wide-ranging debate on the economy so that the three contenders in the Opposition's jumble sale can tell the House what minimum wage rate is consistent with their concepts of full employment?

Mr. Newton: I should be happy to see whether I could find time for such a debate. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) is urging me to find time for a wide-ranging debate on the economy, which we will certainly seek to do. There are a number of questions, alongside the one that my hon. Friend has asked, which we should like to see answered—not least, which of the Government's trade union reforms they would reverse, whether they would ever oppose any strike and what they have to say about the current rail strike.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): In view of the briefing from 10 Downing street at the weekend, contradicting the President of the Board of Trade's statement to the House on the Post Office privatisation, could the Leader of the House find time for an early debate on the matter so that we can clarify the Government's policy? We could also take the opportunity to condemn the statements and the behaviour of the chief executive of the Post Office, a public servant who has openly adopted a political stance favouring the privatisation of the Post Office in conspiracy with the President of the Board of Trade, possibly against the Prime Minister.

Mr. Newton: We shall be publishing the Green Paper as soon as we can, and the hon. Gentleman might wish to hold his fire until then.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May we have a debate next week on the important subject of literal democracy? During that debate, we could consider the personal impact made on the people of Devon and East Plymouth in the European elections by the Liberal Democrat candidate, Mr.—[Interruption.]— he obviously did not make an impact on Liberal Democrat Members here either. We are told by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) that if people in that European constituency wished to identify the Liberal Democrat candidate, they had to crawl all over the small print on the ballot paper.

Mr. Newton: I shall take that as another interesting suggestion for the debate sought by the hon. Member for Workington.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Could the Leader of the House arrange next week for the Prime Minister to respond to early-day motion 1287?

[That this House applauds the efforts of the Rail and Marine Workers Union and the International Transport Workers Federation for financing and undertaking a marine search for the MV 'Derbyshire' that sank in the China Sea with the loss of all her crew; and wishes them every success in their endeavours that will be welcomed by seafarers worldwide, and in particular the bereaved families of the MV 'Derbyshire's crew who have waited for far too long for a reopening of the inquiry into the tragic loss of the 'Derbyshire' that casts serious doubts on the safety and seaworthiness of this type of bulk carrier.]

That motion and early-day motions 1310 and 1317 refer to the MV Derbyshire and the recent events concerning the sinking of the vessel. They propose that the House address the question not only of the Derbyshire, but of bulk carriers in general.

Will the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to state next week that he supports the view that the Derbyshire families are entitled at this stage to an inquiry and to demand that the Government should now take responsibility for furthering the investigation to establish the cause of the loss of that vessel and its 44 crew?

Mr. Newton: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand, the Government share the sympathy which he has expressed to the families of those lost on the Derbyshire, and we understand the renewed concern following the discovery of the wreck. The chief inspector of marine accidents will advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport in due course whether there is any justification to reopen the investigation.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Can my right hon. Friend find time next week for a debate on Members' interests so that the practice of Liberal Democrat Members of using private polls for personal gain can be thoroughly examined? Would not that also give us an opportunity to recall that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) spoke for three hours one Friday morning, thus talking out Enoch Powell's abortion Bill?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware that the Select Committee on the Register of Members' Interests, as shown in today's Votes and Proceedings, has agreed a report. I cannot yet be sure whether that will require a debate, but I will bear it in mind.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): According to news reports this morning, President Clinton has praised the city of Houston in Texas for its recent record in reducing crime. That city has encouraged householders to arm themselves and shoot strangers who approach their houses, and an innocent British citizen, Andrew de Vries, was recently gunned down by a householder in Houston. May we, therefore, have an early statement from the Foreign Office about the advice that it is issuing to British citizens who go to Houston and, more important, about the assistance that it will provide to British citizens who, tragically, fall foul of a gun law under which people shoot first and ask questions later?

Mr. Newton: I will certainly bring that question to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): Has the Labour party approached my right hon. Friend to use one of its Opposition supply days to debate early-day motion [illegible]

[That this House, noting the grossly unfair distribution of wealth in Britain under capitalism and the widening gap between rich and poor that has taken place over the last 15 years and recalling that the present Budget deficit is entirely attributable to tax reductions given to the richest taxpayers, and the cost of unemployment that was deliberately created, is convinced that the burden of military expenditure is far higher than can be justified and that other Government policies have been wasteful and inefficient; believes that the imposition of higher levels of VAT and its extension to fuel imposes a heavy burden on those least able to pay, as do other increases in taxation imposed in the recent Budget; rejects arguments that all reductions in taxation are necessarily desirable regardless of the purpose for which the tax is raised and the social consequences that would follow; affirms that the recovery of full employment, planned defence diversification, the rebuilding of our infrastructure, the extension of essential public services and the regeneration of British industry will require massive public investment, the harnessing of the nation's savings and taxation fairly shared and assessed on the ability to pay; and calls for a clear socialist commitment to be made now, about future economic, fiscal, industrial and social policies to secure these objectives.]

The motion calls for a clear socialist commitment to massive public spending and has been signed by 50 Labour Members. Should that debate take place, may an opportunity be given to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) to come to the Dispatch Box and say whether he agrees with that sizeable chunk of Labour's electoral college?

Mr. Newton: I need hardly say that I have had no such request for a debate; nor do I expect one. Indeed, on the form of the last few days, even if I were to find time for such a debate, I doubt whether we would get any answers from Opposition Front-Bench Members.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May we have a debate next week on football in this country, not simply because I should like to have a whinge on how Chelsea was robbed blind in the cup final by a strutting pedant from a public school who was purporting to be a referee but so that we could discuss the allocation of cup final tickets, the activity of touts outside Wembley stadium on the day, and the Football Association's decision to impose some horrendous penalties on Tottenham Hotspur? Those matters need to be discussed in the House because our constituents are discussing them outside.

Mr. Newton: I understand the hon. Gentleman's unhappiness about the outcome of the cup final. There may be one or two hon. Members from Manchester here. I had better not express my view—[Interruption.] I shall be cautious about getting involved in the matter between Chelsea and Manchester. It was an interesting game. The hon. Gentleman's last point is a matter for the Football Association and, again, the Government would not wish to get involved in it.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): May we have a debate on the serious issue of the import of Brazilian mahogany into Britain, given the serious damage done to both the ecology and the lives of indigenous people by the extraction of that mahogany? Although most of the imports of mahogany are illegal, the authorities here have failed to investigate the matter or take legal action.

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman is alleging a failure properly to enforce the law on imports into this country—in this case, of certain forms of timber—my right course is to draw the matter to the attention of the relevant enforcement authorities.

Points of Order

4.2 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether you would consider helping the Scots. As you know, every third Monday, the Attorney-General answers questions in the House. Alas, the Lord Advocate representing the Crown Office has no opportunity to do so.

I understand that the Chair is involved in discussions about how the Lord Advocate can report directly to the House of Commons. This afternoon, we had an example of that when I asked the Leader of the House a question about Lockerbie, which, after all, was the biggest crime against civilians in the western world since 1945. The Lord Advocate has been making dismissive statements about a proper investigation of extraordinary statements that have been made in middle east courts. I do not know whether those statements are valid, but some of us want to know what the Government intend to do to ascertain whether what is going on in the Beirut courts, with individuals claiming responsibility for the crime, will be properly investigated. The only way in which we could do that is to ask the Lord Advocate questions either upstairs in some Scottish Grand Committee procedure or if he could come to some other Committee established by Parliament.

As I understand it, there are discussions taking place, but they have been going on for some time on that matter and I wondered whether they were going to be brought to a head.

Madam Speaker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's deep concern about this matter, but it is not a question at this stage for the Chair. It is something that the House itself must deal with. As he will know, the Leader of the House is on the Government Front Bench and will no doubt have heard his comments. Perhaps he can make some inquiries into those matters on behalf of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I ask you whether you consider, in your role as the protector of the rights of Back-Bench Members of Parliament and protector of the rights of the House, that you might inquire into the matter of a question that I asked the Secretary of State for Wales, who is in his place? I received an answer on 12 May concerning irregular payments made by the Welsh Development Agency to its staff throughout the 1980s.

A report appeared in a newspaper this morning that went into details about those irregular payments, and the new management of the WDA claimed the credit for initiating that investigation. I have had no answer from the Secretary of State. I wonder whether you could approach the office of the Secretary of State and ask him to put right that matter and make some type of statement to the House.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. That is disturbing to the Welsh affairs shadow Front Bench as well, because, in spite of the long period of notice that was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) in writing to the Secretary of State six weeks ago and the thundering silence from the Welsh Office, it appears now that the device of the quango concerned itself issuing the information in the Daily Post for publication this morning is being used to throw Members of Parliament off the scent, and that Secretaries of State, who are responsible to the House even for the acts of their predecessors, are simply not prepared to abide by that accountability of which I believe that you, Madam Speaker, are the protector.

Madam Speaker: I obviously cannot concern myself with newspaper reports, but I am concerned if the hon. Gentleman has not had a response to the question that he has placed on the Order Paper. I place prime importance on the procedures whereby individual Members receive proper responses when they place questions, and that statements are made in the House before they are given to newspapers.

The Secretary of State for Wales is on the Front Bench and no doubt he will now deal directly with the matter as far as he is free and able to do so.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Further to a parliamentary written reply that I received from the Secretary of State for the Environment, have you had any indication that he wishes to come to the House to make a statement about his reply to me to say that he, along with the Secretary of State for Social Security, instructed parliamentary counsel to draft amendments to the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill and for those amendments to be given to private Members? Have you had any indication that he will be coming to the House to make a statement about that disgraceful business?

Madam Speaker: I have had no such indication. I understand that the hon. Lady has written to me, but I have not as yet even seen her letter. Perhaps I can deal with it when I have seen her letter.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. MacKay.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Local Government (Wales) Bill [Lords]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [15 June] proposed on consideration of the Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), That the clause (Financing of local government in Wales) be read a Second time—

> '.—The Secretary of State, after consulting the Treasury, shall within six months of this Act coming into force present a report to Parliament on methods to restructure the financing of local government in Wales; such report shall include consideration of—
> (a) the feasibility of local government raising a local income tax, or receiving a proportion of the VAT and corporation tax arising from businesses within their area;
> (b) a tax placed upon second homes in Wales, the proceeds of which shall accrue to local government; and
> (c) the abolition of council tax and the uniform business rate.'.—[Mr. Wigley.]

Question again proposed.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I was somewhat put out last night on two accounts. First, I was put out by the way in which the debate was brought to a conclusion without any consultation with Members of Plaid Cymru, when we were fairly close to the end of a short debate, which we are now continuing, and which will no doubt take longer than it would have taken last night. I was even more put out by the response that I received from the Minister to the substance of the debate. The guts of the new clause was the question of how we make more resources available to local government and how we enable local government to have greater flexibility and discretion in the use of those resources, rather than its having to follow the diktats laid down by the Welsh Office and by central Government in London.

Goodness only knows, given the social and environmental conditions and the challenges of education and creating jobs in all our communities in Wales—especially in the run-down, old industrial areas, be it the slate quarrying areas in my constituency or the old coal mining and steel making areas—local government needs resources. It certainly needs more than it is getting and it also needs a greater discretion and flexibility to use resources to meet requirements in the various areas.

The Minister gave the impression that the council tax system is working perfectly. I do not doubt that it works better than the poll tax—it would be difficult not to be better. However, he must be aware, as I am, of countless constituents who feel that they have been the recipients of very rough justice under the banding system. He must also be aware of the strong feeling about the business rate. For many small businesses, that sort of overhead, in addition to the cost of water—which itself is often a heavy burden—could pull them down. There is a need to consider a more flexible system so that those who have difficulty paying could have lower bills while those who are doing well take on a little more of the burden. There is also the question of local government's use of the capital resources gained from selling council houses. There is a need to build new property for the thousands of people in Wales who are on housing waiting lists. All those matters need to be reviewed.

What disappoints me in particular is that the Government do not acknowledge the need to consider finance together with functions and structure. In the 1970s reorganisation—that was, after all, the baby of a Conservative Government—the opportunity was lost to look at finance, functions and structure together. That mistake is now being made again and I very much regret it.

I appreciate that we will not get much further on these issues this afternoon and that there is a wish to make progress on the Bill. However, I want to put to the Minister the fact that we must soon review the way in which the finances of local government work. There is also a need to give local government greater freedom and responsibility. By doing so, we will have a more meaningful form of democracy in local government in Wales.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 12

RIGHT TO NOTICE OF TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT

'.—The rights of employees of local authorities in Wales to notice of termination of employment and payment in lieu of notice, whether under contract or under sections 49 and 50 of and Schedule 3 to the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, whichever shall be the greater, shall be preserved.'.—[Mr. Morgan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 30, in clause 42, page 33, line 17, leave out from beginning to end of line 46.

No. 31, in clause 43, page 34, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 38.

Government amendment No. 62.

No. 34, in clause 44, page 34, line 39, leave out from beginning to end of line 11 on page 35.

No. 12, in page 34, line 44, after 'treated', insert 'either'.

No. 13, in page 35, line 3, at end insert

'or to be entitled after 1st April 1996 to receive equivalent redundancy payments from the new principal council.'.

Government amendments Nos. 63 to 65.

No. 33, in clause 45, page 35, line 12, leave out from beginning to end of line 39.

Government amendment No. 66.

Mr. Morgan: This is one of the most important groups of amendments that we shall discuss, for two reasons. First, 130,000 people work in local government in Wales and the Welsh Members who represent them here must be aware of the need to give them some reasonable protection of their accumulated rights—or acquired rights, to use the European phrase that has come to the fore in the last week following the historic judgment of the European Court of Justice.

The second reason is important procedurally—I know you will take a particular interest in that, Madam Speaker—and relates to events after Second Reading on 15 March. The point was raised in Committee, but this is the first opportunity that the Secretary of State will have had directly to deal with the matter since Second Reading, although apologies were made on his behalf in Committee.

On Second Reading on 15 March, the Secretary of State recognised that clause 44 did not give adequate protection to workers in local government who might be affected directly by the Bill in terms of loss of status, loss of earnings or, ultimately, loss of jobs. He said that clause 44 would be redrafted by the time the Bill reached Committee stage. Unfortunately, although that pledge was repeated in the wind-up speech on Second Reading by the Under-Secretary of State, who I am glad to see in his place, there were no amendments to clause 44.

An apology was made by the Under-Secretary of State on behalf of the Secretary of State, who was not a member of the Committee, but we have been told by people who have an extremely detailed knowledge of the proceedings of the House that the parliamentary draftsmen deputed to prepare the amendment to clause 44, as per the pledge given by the Secretary of State, were taken off it to follow instructions given to them by a non-Cabinet Minister, the Minister of State for Social Security and Disabled People, who was in his place five minutes ago, who issued instructions to the parliamentary draftsmen—I understand that it was the same parliamentary draftsmen—to stop preparing the amendments to clause 44 and instead to prepare the dilatory amendments to help the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) spike the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill.

We have been given two unsigned letters to that effect by people whose understanding of the proceedings of the House in preparation of legislation is extremely detailed. In attempting to pursue the matter and get the full facts, I asked the Secretary of State for Wales on 23 May on what date the instructions were given to the parliamentary draftsmen to prepare the amendments to clause 44 of the Local Government (Wales) Bill, as had been promised.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): And by whom.

Mr. Morgan: I received no answer from the Secretary of State. He blocked it by saying that it is not the practice to provide details of internal decisions of that kind—a totally absurd answer as I asked the question only because, just five days previously on 18 May, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) had received an answer from a more junior Minister, the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, to his question:

"on what date the Minister for Disabled People authorised his Department to instruct Parliamentary Counsel on the drafting of the amendments tabled to the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill".—[Official Report, 18 May 1994; Vol. 243, c. 525.]

If the Minister of State can answer that on 20 April 1994 he authorised his officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to draft the said amendments that caused such interest at the time, particularly from you, Madam Speaker, I cannot understand why the Secretary of State for Wales cannot tell me, the people of Wales and the 130,000 people who work in local government in Wales on what date the Secretary of State sent his instructions to Parliamentary Counsel. I was told it was before; I am now told that it was after.

Mr. Alfred Morris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. What he has said this afternoon is highly disturbing in relation to the Government's tactics on the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill. He is arguing that higher priority was given to drafting the 80 amendments for Conservative Members to wreck the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill than was given to the keeping of a pledge to the House of Commons about the drafting of amendments to this Bill. That must be a very disturbing revelation for people on both sides of the House. I understand that what my hon. Friend has said is very well founded. I hope that the Secretary of State for Wales will now respond. He did not respond to the request for a written answer; I hope he will respond now. It is a very important House of Commons matter.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his further elucidation, and for confirmation of the importance of this issue by the person whose private Member's Bill was affected. It may not be proper for me to ask you, Madam Speaker, whether you could command the Secretary of State for Wales to answer the question.

Madam Speaker: Order. It would not be in order for me to enter the debate.

Mr. Morgan: But to stay within the rules of order of the House and to protect the public right of access to information—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman wrote to me on that matter and I responded—the House did not know that. That is why the hon. Gentleman is able to raise the issue again today. It is for the Minister to respond—and if the hon. Gentleman will bring his remarks to a conclusion, the Minister may do so.

Mr. Morgan: I will not bring my remarks to a conclusion just yet. The Secretary of State does not seem anxious to answer, but the Minister is rising in his place, so I will give way to him.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his reply to the hon. Gentleman, it is not usual for the Government to announce the dates on which instructions were given to counsel. However, I am prepared to tell the hon. Gentleman that the date when final instructions regarding this particular matter were given to parliamentary draftsmen was 25 May.

I apologise to the House for the delay that occurred and for the fact that we were unable to produce amendments for the Committee stage as promised on Second Reading. The reason was that there had to be consultations within Government, and in particular with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for the Environment, because similar provisions have to apply in Scotland and England, in respect of local government reorganisation, as in Wales.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to the Minister for going as far as he did, even though it would have been preferable for the Secretary of State to have answered, because he was not a member of the Committee and this is his first opportunity to apologise to the House for breaching the principle that if a Secretary of State, as a member of the Cabinet, makes a promise at the Dispatch Box on Second Reading to produce amendments in time for the Committee stage, it is kept. Such a promise is not meant to be like shortcrust pastry and easily broken, but is supposed to be of a cast-iron character.

I noticed that the Minister's answer was heavily qualified, for he used the words "final instructions". He said that they were given after the Committee had finished dealing with clause 44 on 17 May. Perhaps the Secretary of State can say when parliamentary draftsmen were first instructed to produce amendments to clause 44.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. John Redwood): I unreservedly apologise for not meeting the commitment that I gave. I agree with all right hon. and hon. Members that one's duties to the House are most important and that one should always endeavour to meet one's undertakings. I did my best. It is not always possible to get busy colleagues together as rapidly as necessary to secure collective agreement on important matters. I tried, I failed and I am extremely sorry. My right hon. Friend the Minister gave the truthful reason why we were unable to meet quickly enough to obtain the agreement needed, but we did so as soon as we could.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would like the Secretary of State for Wales to confirm—

Madam Speaker: Order. The point of order should be to me, not to the Secretary of State. It must concern a breach of the Standing Orders of the House or our rules of procedure.

Ms Lynne: Can you confirm, Madam Speaker, that what I am about to say in respect of the Minister's reply—

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot give a ruling on anything that the hon. Lady is about to say. If the hon. Lady seeks to intervene, she can enter the debate—but she must not involve me in the debate.

Ms Lynne: I feel that the House may have been misled this afternoon, so I thought it would be more appropriate to raise a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should not use a point of order in that way. Obviously she has something to say, and she is perfectly entitled to intervene. If she wishes to do so, she must seek the consent of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan).

Mr. Morgan: I will first make the point that the Secretary of State has still not answered my question. Given the qualification in the Minister's response that "final instructions" were given on 24 May—which I am happy to accept—may the House be told whether earlier instructions were given, pertaining to the drafting of amendments to clause 44, as appears to be the case according to information that I received? If not, why did the Minister qualify his reply with the words "final instructions"?

Sir Wyn Roberts: The simple point is that one assumes that the draftsman reads Second Reading debates, and he would have seen from what was said on Second Reading that there would be changes.

Mr. Morgan: I am sorry, but I hope that before we finish this debate the Minister of State will rethink that answer, because it is totally inadequate. Is he saying that there was no contact other than that passive one, with the Office of Parliamentary Counsel being expected to read Second Reading debates and then request the draft amendments from the Minister? Is that the way in which the Welsh Office works in respect of drafting amendments? If it is, it is not surprising that a more junior Minister than the Secretary of State for Wales was able to get priority in the queue.

Ms Lynne: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that I received an answer from the Secretary of State for Wales on 25 May in response to a written parliamentary question, in which I asked:

> "on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members."

The Secretary of State for Wales replied:

> "I am advised there have been no such requests or instructions since April 1992."—[Official Report, 25 May 1994; Vol. 244, c. 176-177.]

I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would comment on what he feels about the timing of that answer.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for supplying that information, which I will have to digest. Clearly, she has asked similar questions of many other Ministers. What is astonishing is that on Second Reading the Secretary of State gave an undertaking, which was breached, and that there was a procedure—I am informed —which meant that the Secretary of State for Wales appeared to be in the slow lane and the Minister of State for the Disabled, in tabling the dilatory amendments—which, of course, do not assist the legislation, which is why the taxpayer pays the salaries of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel—was put in the fast lane and given priority over the preparation of genuine and constructive improvements to legislation which were promised at the Dispatch Box.

That is an extremely unsatisfactory procedure when the futures of 140,000 people in local government are at stake on the one hand and the interests of 6 million disabled people are at stake on the other. Both have been shafted by a very shabby bit of dirty tricks at the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Redwood rose—

Mr. Morgan: I give way to one of the authors.

Mr. Redwood: That is a most unfair allegation. I have apologised to the House for the delay. I have given an honest explanation of the delay. It was a question of getting colleagues together and getting agreement on a general policy that would be relevant in Scotland and England, as well as Wales, to ensure that what we were doing was sensible or compatible, one with the other. My right hon. Friend gave a sensibly cautious reply about contacts with Parliamentary Counsel because neither he nor I usually undertake those contacts; they are undertaken by officials on our behalf, and we do not have the detailed knowledge of every contact that they have. But I now have advice to say that there was contact throughout April and May with Parliamentary Counsel, as one would expect, and they discussed options, but they were not able to give final instructions, because Ministers had not settled the policy. It is nothing to do with fast and slow lanes, or disagreements between ourselves and another Bill and another Minister. It is to do with settling our policy for this Bill to get it right.

Mr. Morgan: I do not think that we want to spend hours and hours on this issue, but on a like-for-like basis the Secretary of State has still not given the answer that is comparable to that given by the Minister for the Disabled. He is talking about continuous contacts, as though it were impossible for any Minister to specify a single date on which instructions are issued. Yet a more junior Minister —the Minister of State for the Disabled—was able to do that, albeit under enormous pressure, which was exerted by you, Madam Speaker, by other hon. Members and by people outside, in relation to the disgust that people generally felt about the way in which the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill was shafted, at taxpayer's expense and in an extremely illegitimate procedure. It was an abuse of the purposes to which the Office of Parliamentary Counsel is constitutionally put, and an unconstitutional method was used to shaft that Bill. What made matters much worse was the displacement of the proper use of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel to produce the amendments that had been promised.

I consider Government amendment No. 62 inadequate. Any member of the 140,000 staff who work in local government in Wales will still encounter difficulties in the event of redundancy or any other detriment arising from the Bill. The amendment does not appear to give local government staff any right to sue a new authority through an industrial tribunal, claiming unfair or constructive dismissal or other detriment. Although they could sue the old authority, that authority will not be able to pay up if it no longer exists, and there appears to be no guarantee that the new authority would carry the obligation to meet any claim for damages if a tribunal found in favour of a staff member whose case was not considered until after 1 April 1996.

4.30 pm

It seems that there is to be no transfer to the new authority of the full legal liability in regard to such cases. It takes some time for constructive dismissal cases to be dealt with by tribunals. Would staff be able to sue the new authority? If it is the old authority that they must sue, how would they get that authority to pay up?

There is another reason why the Government amendment is not as good as our new clause 17. The right to consult and the right to proper collective representation appeared to be at the heart of last week's ruling by the European Court of Justice, which conferred the continuation of rights acquired in previous employment when there is a legal transfer to a new employer. The amendment, however, does not seem to cover that.

It could be said that, until that ruling by the European Court, the Government could not have known that such a provision would have to be incorporated into the Bill. However, the matter has been in progress since the Government introduced their 1981 legislation, and they have had a fair bit of time to consider the implications of the acquired rights directive.

The Welsh Office, and many Welsh local authorities, have been at the heart of many of the most interesting test cases involving the directive and the continuation of workers' rights after their transfer of employment. We need only think of the Dyfed school cleaners test case, and a case that directly involved the Welsh Office's own lawyers—the South Glamorgan health authority case, in which the Welsh Office was involved as a party. That case concerned the potential privatisation of cleaning and catering services at four of the authority's hospitals; the authority was responsible to the Welsh Office.

I should have expected those test cases to have taught the Welsh Office lawyers a lesson—that they must cover the point arising from the acquired rights directive, particularly the right to consultation and collective representation, in legislation that will transfer 140,000 people. As far as we can tell, our new clause complies with both the spirit and the letter of the directive; more important, it will leave local government staff no worse off than they are now in terms of rights acquired through length of service, employment contracts and so forth.

It would save us a good deal of time and trouble if the Government were willing to accept today that their amendment may not be as up to date as they would like, although it has taken them three months—since Second Reading—to produce it. As the Government are already on the back foot on this issue, it would be helpful if, before the Bill goes to another place, they would further improve it, after taking on board some of the points that have been made since the path-breaking judgment of the European Court of Justice last week and after perusing new clause 17 and some of the other amendments.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I must confess that, due possibly to my ignorance and despite the Secretary of State's genuine promises on Second Reading, I found it difficult in Committee to understand where the staff stood in terms of the law and the way in which Government would handle the problems. As Opposition Members represent so many constituents who serve in local government, we should not allow the Bill to be enacted without a most thorough examination of how the Government intend to safeguard staff interests after the changes, which are beyond the control and responsibility of the staff. Reorganisation will be imposed on many people.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, as recently as 14 June, a letter was sent dealing with regulations on redundancy? There is great consternation among local government staff in Wales, who believe that, at this late stage, redundancy terms are far worse than Welsh Office officials led them to believe during negotiations. The percentage of staff who will be redundant will find themselves in a terrible position. It will be difficult for them to find commensurate employment and they will have little compensation.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. and learned Gentleman rightly brings that serious issue to the attention of the House. I did not realise that such a letter existed. It adds to my preamble in which I said that we owe it to the staff to consider the matter carefully. We shall debate the issue until we find out what the position will be for local government staff, who will be seriously affected by the legislation. Whatever happens, many staff will experience a disturbing and anxious time.

The only way of handling the issue is to note what we have been told in the House, and particularly in Committee, in order to understand the ramifications of amendment No. 62. In Committee, two significant statements were made by the Under-Secretary. He said:

> "The Government accept that TUPE may apply to transfers in the public sector, including local government reorganisation, but the way in which it does so would depend on circumstances in each case. The Government do not accept that in the context of reorganisation all staff would necessarily have a right of transfer under TUPE. No doubt, we may want to return to that later."

That statement on the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 applied to a considerable number of staff who were affected by reorganisation.

Later in the debate, the Under-Secretary clarified his argument. He referred to the advice of Patrick Elias QC, which had been received by the Local Government Management Board. He said that the advice

> "suggests that senior and central administrative staff in split authorities, such as counties, are less likely to be protected than similar staff in merged authorities, such as most district councils. If that advice is correct, it emphasises the importance of devising staff transfer arrangements that, as far as possible, provide equality of treatment for all staff."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 17 May 1994; c. 524-40.]

That statement lifted the veil on the first statement that some staff were covered by TUPE and some were not. He clarified and redefined his first statement. That is how matters stood. At least TUPE could apply to a large number of staff.

Perhaps I am not reading the legislation correctly or perhaps words do not mean what they seem to mean. I want to draw the House's attention to the words of amendment No. 62. It is a Government amendment and has not yet been moved or spoken to. Inevitably, the initial part of our debate will be interrogative—asking questions, rather than making statements. The amendment says:

> "in relation to a person whose contract of employment is terminated as a result of this Act"—

so the responsibility is fully that of Government legislation—

> "it shall be assumed that he was dismissed by the old authority concerned by reason of redundancy immediately before 1st April 1996 and that his dismissal was proposed by the authority."

What do those words mean and what effect will they have on people's rights under TUPE? I have a lawyer sitting not far from me. Am I right in saying that it is an attempt to frustrate contract? If so, is that the intention? If that is the intention and we accept the amendment, does it remove people's rights under TUPE? I am a layman wandering around in this world and I am trying to use the correct language. If people have been dismissed and re-employed, does it mean that a transfer has not taken place? Therefore, am I right in saying that TUPE will not apply?

If I am right, it is very serious and I find it hard to believe. It rubs against every assurance and all the good words that we had from Ministers in Committee and on Second Reading to the effect that there was no such intention. Do the words of that amendment in any way jeopardise the rights under TUPE which were accepted by Ministers and by counsel's opinion to the Welsh Local Government Management Board?

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): This is the core point of the debate. It was raised by me on Second Reading and an assurance was given. It was raised again in Committee on 17 May and again an assurance was given. To this day, we do not know the answer. The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right to refer to frustration of contract. It is nothing short of that and, in my respectful submission, it is a disgrace. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. Rowlands: I am getting some confirmation about my interpretation from those who know more about this than I do. If my interpretation is correct, we should be deeply disturbed and there should be a tremendous row. I am half hoping that somehow Ministers will show that this is not the way to interpret the words and that there is no intention to remove the rights of staff who are to be transferred. We will look later at the view of Mr. Elias and the Local Government Management Board. Ministers accepted in Committee that TUPE applied to a significant proportion of staff, although not to all. I fear that amendment No. 62 could be interpreted as an attempt to remove people's rights, because they are not being transferred but are being dismissed and reappointed. I do not want to build great edifices on a weak foundation. However, if I am right, we will feel a sense of betrayal, as will an enormous number of staff in local government.

Ministers have been very helpful in this regard. After Mr. Patrick Elias's opinion was referred to in Committee, we were quickly circulated with copies of his opinion. I suspect that it has been subsumed into the Local Government Management Board document "Reorganisation in Wales Human Resource Timetable". I am old-fashioned and I think that this sort of language—the language of modern industrial relations—should be outlawed by the Secretary of State. In fairness, it is not his document. I do not want to weary the House with the document, but it analyses in considerable detail the application of TUPE. It states that the Advocate-General of the European Court of Justice believes that the directive applies to the public sector and covers transfers of undertaking such as those affected by local government reorganisation. It concludes by stating in paragraph 31:

> "Although it seems certain that as a result of this change TUPE will apply to local government reorganisation, the government has so far not formally accepted this, and the point is yet to be tested in the courts."

4.45 pm

I thought that in Committee the Government had accepted that certain groups of staff would be covered by TUPE. I accept that they qualified that by saying that it did not apply to all staff. That is shown by the second of the two references I made to our debates in Committee on clause 44. If nothing else, before the House proceeds much further, we must obtain confirmation from the Minister that TUPE does and will apply.

If any doubt is left, are we going to drive local government representatives and organisations to the enormously expensive business of applying for a judicial review? That is potentially very expensive and would use a great deal of council tax payers' money. Also, imagine the enormous cost of having to go to the European Court. We should not pass amendments which we do not understand and which would leave enormous challenges to be pursued and enormous costs incurred. We need a full explanation. In the spirit in which I introduced my remarks, I ask the Minister to clear this matter up.

My next point deals with who is covered by the amendment. Local government employs a fantastic number of people in different ways. The Minister was kind enough to provide me in a written answer with some figures on the employees in local authorities. Mid Glamorgan has 12,000 full-time employees and 9,000 part-time employees. Would just the administrative staff be covered or would everybody who works for the authority? How many employees, as opposed to administrative staff, would be affected and have their contract deemed to be terminated under amendment No. 62? How extensive is the process described in amendment No. 62?

I should like the Minister to clarify the position of direct labour organisations and direct service organisations. As a result of various Government changes during the 1980s, they are semi-detached from Government and have to apply for contracts. That is a good layman's way of describing them. What happens to those employed by direct labour organisations and direct service organisations as a result of the reorganisation and what are their rights?

I hope that I have indicated—nothing more than that—that those are very important and serious questions to be answered. I am not willing to condemn the Government and I shall not say that they are doing anything nasty, dirty or reprehensible at the moment, but I want to know and try to understand exactly what they are asking us to accept in amendment No. 62. I find the whole world of local government staffing and its language fairly difficult to understand. I should be grateful if the Minister, who perhaps understands such things, would tell me what this marvellous quote from the report by the Local Government Management Board means:

> "The drawing up of staff structures will be a major task for the HAPS".

Who are the HAPS? The report continues:

> "and the management team, (and any other senior staff, including HR specialists".

Paragraph 41 says:

> "Current estimates are that some 90—95 per cent. of existing staff will transfer by order."

Is that the percentage that will be transferred if we accept amendment No. 62, or will anybody be transferred if it appears that a person was dismissed first and then reappointed?

Those are important issues and I hope that the Minister will explain it to hon. Members and, more importantly, to the thousands of people whose livelihood, jobs and security are threatened—perhaps that is a strong word. Anxiety has descended on them as a result of a piece of legislation which we shall probably pass by the end of the evening.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I wonder whether the Minister can help us in relation to the redundancy and severance terms and compensation arrangements for those employees of existing local authorities who are affected by reorganisation. I refer in particular to a letter dated 14 June, which reached its listed recipients only yesterday and, therefore, was made available to hon. Members after the debate had started. In my case, it was made available today. It is addressed, among others, to the Welsh Office, so I assume that the Secretary of State has received his copy by now. It is also addressed to the Shadow Staff Committee for Wales, as well as to district and county councils in England and Wales. I realise, of course, that it is a consultation document and that responses will be sought to it and that it may be amended in due course. However, one is bound to wonder why the document has not appeared with the draft regulations until now, bearing in mind the expressions of concern in Committee several weeks ago.

Mr. Morgan: And on Second Reading.

Mr. Carlile: And, indeed, on Second Reading, as the hon. Gentleman says. Will Ministers explain to the House why such an important matter, affecting so many of our constituents, appears not to have been resolved until this very late stage?

Paragraph 2 of the letter is headed:

> "The Local Government (Compensation For Redundancy) Regulations 1994".

Was the Welsh Office consulted on the matter; if so, what representations did it make on behalf of those loyal servants of local government in Wales, many of whom, if they are in the 5 per cent. or so—a minimum estimate of those who will lose their jobs—will find it difficult to obtain jobs elsewhere, at least without a disturbing and upsetting uprooting of themselves and their families? Paragraph 2 states:

> "A maximum ceiling on payments is now proposed, based on a tariff which takes account of age and service."

When was the change decided which leads to the word "now" being included in the sentence? What is the reasoning behind the introduction of that maximum, which was obviously based on a change of mind by the Departments concerned? The paragraph continues:

> "Employees, aged 50 or over, who qualify for immediate payment of pension under the local government superannuation regulations will not now be able to benefit from these regulations."

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has shown a great grasp of these issues, which is much better than that of many lawyers, who still find employment regulations a little strange and difficult to deal with and are a little perplexed by it all, apart from one or two experts, like the wife of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). Why has it been decided, at least at the proposal stage, that employees who are entitled to benefit from the local government superannuation regulations should no longer be allowed so to do? How is it considered to be fair that that should be brought on employees of 50 or over, who will find it especially difficult to find at least commensurate new employment?

Part 3 of the draft regulations deals with the authorities affected by local government reorganisation and provides that, for a defined period of reorganisation, there will be a mandatory floor between the statutory minimum under employment protection legislation and the discretionary statutory maximum. That means that a limit is placed on the compensation arrangements available to those who are made redundant as a result of local government reorganisation.

We must examine what level of compensation is proposed for those who are made redundant as a result of reorganisation. We are told that those mandatory payments will accrue at the rate of 1.5 weeks' pay for each year of service between the ages of 23 and 41 and 2.5 weeks' pay for those between 42 and 49, but up to a maximum of 45 weeks' pay plus a generous extra half-week for 45 to 49-year-olds. As I understand it, that means that a 22-year-old clerk or housing officer working in a local authority affected by reorganisation will receive six weeks' pay if he has worked there for four years. As an estimate of loss, that is not merely stingy, but borders on being absurd, especially for local government officers working in rural Wales. I hope that my understanding of what is proposed is wrong, but that understanding is shared by local government officers who have received notice of the proposals in the past 24 hours.

Let us take another example at the extreme end: a 53-year-old chief planning officer, who has very little prospect of obtaining a job elsewhere, will receive a maximum of 45 weeks' pay as compensation. How does that compare with the compensation arrangements available in the private sector? It does not compare even with the limited compensation arrangements available to Members of the House who lose their seats.

Surely, at the very least, we should be able to give loyal and experienced local government officers compensation arrangements commensurate with what they would be able to obtain in a comparable area. I suggest to Ministers that one comparison would be what employees would obtain if they went to an ordinary court for breach of a similar contract of employment. Someone in as one-off a type of employment as the example I have given should be able to claim a year's notice at the least, yet under the proposals he would be given just over three quarters of a year's notice. It is not good enough for the Government to set such low standards in the public service compared with the private sector. There are examples of people who have been brought into the public service from the private sector and of enormous compensation payments being made.

The draft regulations provide:

> "during the period of reorganisation, local authorities are obliged to compensate employees below the level of the mandatory floor but . . . they retain discretion to pay up to the prescribed maximum".

There is great uncertainty among local government officers about what they will be able to recover in compensation for loss of office and consternation and genuine concern in Wales as a result of the draft regulations and the letter, not least because the information has been provided at such a late stage.

5 pm

Will Ministers at least confirm that they will adopt a flexible attitude during the consultation period and that they will examine seriously the "comparables" that can be found elsewhere so that we can ensure that fair compensation arrangements are available to some good officers who, unfortunately, are bound to lose their jobs? That is a matter of particular concern, as many of the 5 per cent. will be at a senior level. They will be in the older age group and are likely to be the people most affected by heavy family and mortgage commitments, which they may become unable to meet.

Mr. Llwyd: I have three specific questions to ask. First, amendment No. 62 refers to "any other enactment". What does that mean? Am I right in thinking that it is a reference to TUPE regulations; or is it a reference to another enactment? It is important that the meaning of those words is made clear today.

Secondly, will there be an entitlement to receive notice of termination of employment? The Minister will no doubt realise why I ask that, and it is important that we receive an answer.

Thirdly, in connection with the "enactment" to which I have already referred, I draw the Minister's attention to section 5 of the TUPE regulations. Am I right in thinking that any contract which would otherwise terminate shall be transferred to the new authority by virtue of those regulations? Those three core questions deserve to be answered, not only for our sake but for that of the tens of thousands of people in Wales who have, alas, been considering the passage of the Bill with a less than enthusiastic gaze in the past few months.

Part of the reason for their lack of enthusiasm has been that matters so vital to them have had to be raised time and time again. As I said in an intervention on the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), on Second Reading I mentioned TUPE and the frustration of contract and was told that the issues would be dealt with. Not having been satisfied in any shape or form, I raised them again in Committee on 17 May, when assurances were again given. If Government assurances are to mean anything, they must be fulfilled. That is a painfully obvious point. I believe that these issues, at the very least, should be cleared up today so that we can give accurate reports to the people of Wales.

As a first principle, I do not accept that the provisions now being discussed by the English Staff Commission should apply to Wales. Clearly, we are seeking the most appropriate arrangements for employees in Wales, and local government in Wales will of course differ from that in England in two key respects. First, reorganisation in Wales, unlike reorganisation in England, will not be phased but is to take place on one specific date. Therefore, the opportunity for staff to seek other employment in local government is diminished. Secondly, and just as important, local authorities are the major employers in many parts of Wales and, given the economic circumstances of the region —or the country—it might be difficult for staff who lose their jobs as a result of reorganisation to obtain further employment.

I note that the Local Government (Compensation for Redundancy and Premature Retirement) Regulations 1993 give authorities the power to pay at their discretion up to 66 weeks' severance pay—less, of course, any redundancy payment to which the employee would be entitled under existing statutory and local government legislation. Those regulations were made in the wake of the Court of Appeal decision in the case of North Tyneside Metropolitan Borough Council v. Allsop. They were not drawn up as a response to local government reorganisation, and I believe that they would be inappropriate in this instance.

Like many other hon. Members, I am especially concerned about employees aged between 40 and 49 or 50 who may be casualties of this reorganisation and who will doubtless find it very difficult to obtain commensurate jobs elsewhere. Compensation arrangements for reorganisation should not apply only in respect of redundancies which take place on 31 March 1996. I believe that they should operate for a period of, say, a year or 18 months before and after reorganisation. That would provide an incentive for staff who wish to take early retirement and make way for employees who would otherwise be made redundant on vesting day. It would be only right and fair if that were to happen. Of course, reorganisation compensation should be paid only if redundancy is due specifically to the creation of the new authorities. In the case of other redundancies or early retirements, I believe that the usual arrangements should apply.

I have already asked questions about TUPE—questions which were also eloquently posed this evening by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. Ministers are no doubt aware of last week's landmark decision in the European Court of Justice, and I sincerely trust that the Government will not have to be hauled again by their hair through the courts because of their stubbornness and disrespect for the rights of ordinary working people. I am sure that their mandarins are now considering their obligations in the light of that decision, and I respectfully suggest that TUPE will most definitely apply to everyone involved in this transfer. Indeed, I would go further and say that, fortunately for me, that was also my opinion on 17 May—an opinion I still hold—when I declared that the Government were intent on acting illegally and that EC directive 75/129 on employment provisions, which was later amended by another directive, came into force under the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993. As Ministers are aware, the method proposed under that Act for calculating redundancy payments is abundantly clear.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on some information that I have just received? I have just been told by a senior local government officer that it is now understood that older officers—those over 49 years of age —will not receive the compensation that I outlined. By reason of their age, they will be given less. I understand that in my example a 53-year-old local government officer in Wales will be able to recover only 26 weeks pay under the proposed regulations.

Mr. Llwyd: I agree that that is an appalling scenario, and I trust that it will prove to be faulty in due course. I am sure that the interpretation is right, but it is absolutely unfair and we must examine it carefully.

The 1993 Act details some ways of avoiding dismissals, reducing the number of employees to be dismissed and mitigating the consequences of dismissals. Those matters are important. I have already referred to the TUPE regulations. Once again, I invite the Secretary of State and Ministers to respond to that point. As for the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), if that is the correct interpretation, it is an appalling situation.

There is, I regret to say, continued uncertainty and there are no hard facts about the Secretary of State's commitment to a 95 per cent. staff transfer level. We have heard references to the opinion of Mr. Elias QC. I am still in the dark about that; what is worse—and more important —many thousands of people in local government in Wales are also in the dark. May I ask the Minister how that staff transfer level was initially derived, measured or compiled? How will that level of transfer be achieved if all the staff seeking continued local government employment are not transferred by order on 31 March 1996? The Government need to be precise and clear at this stage or they will face the continuing accusation of window dressing for political and pressure effect, rather than dealing with the substance of this vital issue.

I have already referred to the TUPE regulations. The European acquired rights directive was applied in the European court case. However much Ministers may seek to bury their heads in the sand, we are part of the European Union and, accordingly, we are bound by that directive and the court's decision. I hope, therefore, that in the next few days—not months, as we have seen with the tabling of amendments—we might have some pertinent references to that case and possibly some early and urgent amendments to the way in which the Government are thinking about the matter.

I respectfully remind Ministers that the objective of the European acquired rights directive is twofold: first, there is a need to secure appropriate posts in the new councils for all staff who wish to continue in local government employment; secondly, there is a need to protect both the global level and the important position of local government employment in the socioeconomic life of Wales.

I shall ask the Minister some further questions. I hope —perhaps I am hoping against hope—that he will answer them because we need details; otherwise, as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said yesterday, the process of scrutiny is a sham. If it is a sham, we are letting the people of Wales down. I believe that we are letting them down anyway because the Bill is badly flawed. We need clear indications from the Government on staff transfer arrangements, TUPE and compensation arrangements for Welsh employees.

Reference has been made to frustration of contract. We need details on that today. We also need the details of detriment packages for loss of earnings and so on. Undoubtedly, the Minister will refer to the letter that was sent out on 14 June. I make no apology for not having read it. It is my good fortune that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery handed me a copy a few moments ago. I have not evaluated the covering letter, and I make no apology for that. The letter should have been made available at a much earlier stage than the Report stage of such an important Bill.

To say that the situation is disappointing is not strong enough; I am very disappointed—it is a shambolic way to run any Department. The Department of the Environment is writing letters when the Welsh Office is supposed to be dealing with the matter before the House. Why did the Welsh Office not request the information earlier? Why were hon. Members not made fully aware of the consultation process before now? If I am corrected by the Minister at any stage, I make no apology for that. I am in blissful ignorance of the provisions. It is unfortunate that those of us who spent six weeks in Committee were not even accorded the decency of being allowed to know what consultation was going on behind closed doors. This is supposed to be the Government of open government, but we have yet another example of anything but open government. It is a shambolic experience and I am disgusted by it all.

There are compensation provisions. We are all being invited to take part in the process known as consultation, which may or may not turn out to be true consultation. In the past, I have been less than happy about the standard of comprehension by Ministers and, indeed, the extent to which they are prepared to listen during the consultation process. However, for what it is worth, I will throw my hat into the consultation ring. As the Welsh changes will happen on the same day, and as the average wage for local government employees in Wales is low, it is important that we are given firm indications of the direction in which we are travelling. I have referred to detriment and frustration of contract. Once again, I invite the Minister to respond fully to those points.

I shall put forward one or two views which I hope will be taken into account in the so-called consultation process. I believe that there should be a statutory non-discretionary scheme, adopting the principles of the 1986 regulations but with improvement for employees over 50 and between 45 and 50. Employees aged 50 and over who are so entitled should receive an immediate pension with maximum added years and a maximum severance payment of at least 52 weeks' pay. A maximum of 82 weeks' pay should be made to those not entitled to an immediate pension. Those aged 45 should have their pension frozen and brought into payment at the age of 50 with maximum added years and a minimum severance payment of up to 82 weeks' pay. The calculation of redundancy payments should be based on an actual week's pay or any multiple of that.

Nothing short of a full reply to those detailed points will allay the fears that I have for my constituents and for all local government employees in Wales. They deserve to be told where they are going. They are energetic and they went into the service with the best possible intentions. Some of them went through the trauma of the 1972-74 changes and are now to be subjected to this reorganisation. People in Dolgellau who have young families, mortgages and so on are desperately worried about their future. I cannot stand idly by and tell them, "Yes, I raised it on Second Reading and I am to be given a reply" or "Yes, I raised it in Committee and I am to be given a reply." We are now on Report: for heaven's sake, will the Minister please reply?

In conclusion, I refer briefly to the assurances given by the Under-Secretary of State at a conference in Llandudno on 7 January, to which reference has been made. He said then that he would urge that Welsh provision should be tailor made to meet the needs of organisations in Wales. I am asking him to deliver on that undertaking.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): The Minister will be aware —he will contradict me if I am wrong—that Lliw Valley borough council is the only example of a borough authority that will be split after the change to the new unitary authorities. As such, it is distinct from a county which will —and does—supply services to a range of residents in different borough authorities. When staff are transferred from counties to new unitary authorities, therefore, they will be in a slightly different position from those in a borough authority.

A number of questions were raised by the Under-Secretary of State's answer in Committee when he said, referring to advice received by the Local Government Management Board, that

> "senior and central administrative staff in split authorities, such as counties, are less likely to be protected than similar staff in merged authorities, such as most district councils."

> "If that advice is correct, it emphasises the importance of devising staff transfer arrangements that, as far as possible, provide equality of treatment for all staff."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 17 May 1994; c. 540.]

It is significant that in that brief but highly potent statement the Under-Secretary of State referred only to a split county authority, not to the only example of a split district council that I can think of in the reorganisation —Lliw Valley district council.

Can the Minister reassure my constituents and those people working in Lliw valley—both that part served by my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) and the upper Lliw valley, which I represent? I imagine that a teacher working in a school in Godrergraig, which is to be transferred into the new Neath and Port Talbot unitary authority, will also be transferred to that authority, so there will be no problem. What about a park attendant employed in Pontardawe, let us say? He or she will also be transferred to the new unitary authority, which is Neath and Port Talbot.

What will happen to members of staff in Lliw valley who straddle the divide? They may be housing officials —or work in leisure, recreation or some other council department—who do not have a location on either side of the border. Where would they be transferred and would their rights be fully protected?

It is not clear whether all existing employment rights will be protected consequent upon transfer to the new unitary authorities. That is a general point. Even though the Government are tidying up the arrangements through these amendments, they do not seem to guarantee that all existing employment rights will be protected as a general principle. But it is a particular problem in the schizophrenic situation that I have mentioned, where some employees of Lliw Valley are in the anomalous position of serving both sides of the border and it is not clear to which authority they will be transferred—Neath and Port Talbot or Swansea. Will their redundancy, contracts of employment, pay, salary and conditions all be protected?

It is very important for the Minister to give some serious reassurance that the Bill protects the rights of those individuals who are caught between the two authorities. It is not clear to me that the Bill as drafted, or as it might be changed by these amendments, would give them that protection. They would value a positive response from the Minister in that respect.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This is indeed an important batch of amendments. Let me assure the House at the outset that we do not expect the reorganisation to lead to a large reduction in the number of staff. We hope to secure the necessary reductions in staffing levels by voluntary redundancies. It should, therefore, be possible to avoid any compulsory redundancies on 31 March 1996, but the House will appreciate that I cannot give a guarantee on that matter, since a great deal depends on the decisions of the new authorities and members of staff.

Volunteers for redundancy could be sought in the summer and autumn of 1995, but only from among those staff whose jobs are changing or disappearing as a result of the reorganisation. Staff whose jobs are not changing, such as teachers, care assistants and so forth, will be transferred, so the question of redundancies and compensation will not arise for them.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment announced on Tuesday the Government's proposals for the severance payments that authorities could make and hon. Members have referred to them. We are proposing that staff under the age of 50 could qualify for a redundancy payment of up to 66 weeks' pay, depending on age and length of service. It would be up to the authorities, if they wished, to make a payment at the highest permissible level, but we propose that they should not be allowed to go below a minimum floor, which will apply for reorganisation-related redundancies occurring in the calendar year 1996. That is what we are consulting on and not the document of November 1993, to which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred.

The proposed local government redundancy compensation payments do not cover people beyond the age of 50 because staff over that age can qualify for immediate payment of pension. Staff under the age of 50 cannot do so and it is appropriate, therefore, for the higher redundancy payments to be made to them. They are higher. I assure the House that both the floor of payment and the maximum payments will be considerably better than entitlement, in the form of the statutory minimum under the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978.

The transfer arrangements would be as follows. First, there would be a competition for chief executive and chief officer posts. I would expect that process to be completed by the end of summer 1995. Staff whose jobs were not changing would be identified and listed in draft transfer orders, which would be published no later than the end of November 1995. Any other staff with the right of transfer, under TUPE, would be included in supplementary transfer orders.

Volunteers for redundancy would be sought from the remaining staff. Those who did not volunteer presumably would wish to remain with local government and would be seeking a post in a new authority. The new authorities would have at least until the end of March to complete their procedures for recruiting staff to the new posts that they would be creating.

We hope that sufficient volunteers for redundancy would come forward so as to avoid the need for any compulsory redundancies on 31 March 1996. But if that were not the case, some redundancy notices may need to be served before reorganisation. If such notices had not expired by 31 March 1996, it would be possible to transfer the staff concerned to serve out their notice in a new authority.

Perhaps this is the point at which to emphasise that clause 53(4) provides for new authorities to take over the contractual responsibilities of the old authorities. The arrangements that I have described would maximise certainty for staff at the earliest possible stage in each case, and would ensure that the vast majority of staff from counties and districts transferred to the new authorities receive equal treatment.

5.30 pm

The Opposition amendments would do none of those things. Apart from the staff who have the right to transfer under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, there would be no means to transfer staff from the old authorities to the new. The transfer orders in clause 42 would set out clearly to which authority an individual had been transferred, and I think that that answers the point raised by the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain). The amendments would leave industrial tribunals as the only means of securing certainty in cases of doubt, and of course I cannot commend them to the House.

I want to deal with the Government amendments.

Mr. Morgan: The Minister is quite correct in saying that the emphasis of new clause 12 is on the preserved or acquired right to be able to take a case of unfair or constructive dismissal to an industrial tribunal. Is he then commending the Government's legislation? Is he also guaranteeing that there will be continued rights to sue in an industrial tribunal, regardless of whether one is suing an old or a new authority? Would that be correct even if the case eventually only gets to an industrial tribunal after 1 April 1996, when there will be no old authorities, even if it is one of those which is being sued?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I will come to precisely that point as I deal with Government amendments Nos. 62 to 64.

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am just going to refer to the point made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). The hon. Gentleman, referring to clause 44, said that it shall be assumed that a person was dismissed "by reason of redundancy" and that his dismissal was proposed by the authority. Those words bring with them the requirement to consult representatives of staff, to give notice and so on.

[Sir Wyn Roberts]

In that case, we are talking about people who are not transferred by order and who are in the employment of existing authorities. I shall have more to say about the points made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney in a few moments.

Government amendments Nos. 62 to 65 give effect to the undertaking which my right hon. Friend made to the House on Second Reading to reassure staff that they will have full rights under employment protection legislation, including rights to consultation with representatives of staff and trade unions about prospective redundancies and notice of redundancy.

Mr. Morgan rose—

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am dealing with this set of amendments so the House can understand their full scope. Clause 44 applies only to staff who lose their jobs at the point of reorganisation. We hope to secure the necessary reductions in staffing levels by voluntary redundancies, so it would be possible to avoid compulsory redundancies on 31 March. It is not possible to give an assurance on that point.

Government amendment No. 62 was somehow misunderstood by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. It mentions the relevant employment protection provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 and the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. These are concerned primarily with redundancies, which is precisely the situation dealt with by clause 44.

I think that the hon. Gentleman is confusing matters with the right of transfer which staff might have under the TUPE regulations. Such staff are implicitly recognised in the wording of subsection (1A)(b) of the amendment, which states that > "a contract of employment is transferred—(i) to a new principal council, if it is treated by any provision made by this Act, or by or under any other enactment, as continued in force with that council".

In other words, staff transferred under TUPE will not be covered by clause 44 because they will be transferred. The provisions of the Bill cannot override the requirement of European legislation, such as the TUPE regulations, which implement the acquired rights directive.

Mr. Rowlands: I feel out of my depth and I am willing to accept the ministerial word on the matter. Is it the ministerial word that nothing in the amendment undermines the rights of staff under TUPE in the event of reorganisation? I would appreciate it if the Minister could give that categoric assurance.

Sir Wyn Roberts: TUPE can apply, but it depends on the circumstances of the individual case and I am happy to reaffirm that now. There is no attempt to undermine that directive in any sense.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Government amendment No. 66 plugs a gap which we have identified in clause 45.

Mr. Morgan: One matter needs to be cleared up. If I understood correctly what the Minister said before the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, he was referring to the emphasis which the Government were placing on facilitating the transfer of staff with all their acquired rights under TUPE from the old authorities to the new. He said that this was in the form of a guarantee that the staff will be transferred. The problem is that people can lose rights while they are being transferred. For instance, they may find that they were moving from full-time to part-time work, which would normally give them the right to compensation for detriment. That could take place under TUPE or under old-fashioned UK employment law.

The right hon. Gentleman has not mentioned not only the right to sue for compensation and to be entitled to a redundancy package because a person has lost his job, but the substantial deterioration in terms and conditions, such as a loss of hours. Is he covering that point of detriment as well?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have covered the transfer of staff from one authority to another. I shall again remind the hon. Gentleman of clause 53(4), which states:

> "Anything done by or in relation to an old authority before 1st April 1996 . . . shall . . . have effect as if done by or in relation to the successor authority."

In other words, the liabilities of old authorities transfer under clause 54 to the appropriate new authorities. Clause 44(2) already recognises that such liabilities will be transferred to new authorities. There will not, therefore, be the change which the hon. Gentleman anticipates. If a change resulting in detriment to an individual occurs, the new authority will be as responsible as the old authority might have been.

Mr. Morgan: I am finding some comfort in what the Minister is saying, except for one point—he is overselling the matter to the House. Is he implying that clause 44, as amended by Government amendment No. 62, confers rights to transfer, without loss of acquired rights under employment law? We understand that it is neutral on that point, permitting that to occur without debarring it. It does not confer it as a matter of right. The Minister is leaving the clause in a form whereby staff would have to find out how the right to transfer without losing their acquired rights will be enforced. The right is not conferred by clauses 42 to 45, which pertain to the transfer of staff from the old authorities. It would be misleading to the House and the 140,000 staff who could, in theory, be affected if he tried to imply that he is conferring something on them when, in reality, he is permitting, in a neutral manner, another form of regulation, which will have to come back to the House in another form, to confer that right. Is not the clause simply neutral on that point?

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman is leading us down the wrong garden path. He forgets that all the other employment legislation, for example on redundancies and transfers, comes into play. The clause relates only to local government reorganisation in Wales and the specific transfers of staff that will be needed between authorities. The hon. Gentleman should remember that other employment legislation is still effective.

Government amendment No. 66 plugs a gap which we have identified in clause 45. For example, an individual on a fixed-term contract with an old authority could have already secured a job by competition in one of the new authorities, yet could have claimed damages for loss of office under his existing contract. The House will agree that that would not be an appropriate use of public funds.

Amendments Nos. 12 and 13 are unnecessary.

Mr. Morgan: Before the Minister leaves Government amendment No. 66, may I ask him when he expects to be able to produce the regulations? What areas are they intended to cover? What is the expected timing for producing the regulations, which appear to qualify the right conferred by the rest of the clause? Can he produce fairly soon a list of the headings which those regulations will cover, as it may take a year or so before the Minister produces the regulations themselves? It is a bare-bones explanation simply to say that those regulations will exclude the effect of the clause without saying how soon we may know the range of subjects to be covered under those headings? Can the Minister give us some information on that front?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I do not think that I can give information on the timing of the regulations at this stage. Obviously, they flow from the passage of the Bill and the events that will follow, with which the hon. Gentleman is, by now, as familiar—if not more so—than I am.

Mr. Rowlands rose—

Mr. Llwyd rose—

5.45 pm

Sir Wyn Roberts: I assure the House that anyone who is entitled to a redundancy payment as a result of the reorganisation should receive it. I appreciate the fact that some of the amendments have been probing, but I believe that the provisions in the Government amendments are far superior— [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I want no sub-committees here, please.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Government amendments are far superior to the amendments put forward by the Opposition, and I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to reject the Opposition amendments and accept the Government amendments.

Mr. Morgan: The Minister of State began by saying that he hoped that the clause would be based on the principle of volunteers for redundancy, which would solve most of the problems. The heartfelt way in which he said it may have been based on the fact that he has volunteered for redundancy from his office. This may be his last evening at the Dispatch Box, as reshuffles gather pace.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman should not concern himself with my future as much as that of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who has nominated the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), but will back the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). What on earth has the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) done to him?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that that will be regarded as a rhetorical question. It has nothing to do with the subject under consideration.

Mr. Morgan: I am extremely pleased to have your diktat on that, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I shall not cross swords with you.

Later this evening, we shall be in a position to wish the Minister of State well in his retirement and return to angling, wangling and poetry.

Mr. Llwyd: Before the hon. Gentleman says farewell to the Minister, does he share my concern that, of the five specific, extremely important points that I put to him at the beginning of the debate, not one has been answered? Does he agree that that is unacceptable and that something deceitful may be going on? Why are not we entitled to a reply?

Mr. Morgan: That is the problem we are experiencing. These are complex matters. They are almost arcane when we try to put them into debating points, but they are life-and-death matters to the 140,000 people who work in local government. We are trying to bring the matter to life in the House as it will undoubtedly be brought home to the staff directly affected by it. That is why those of us who, unlike the Minister of State, intend to continue to represent Welsh communities where local government is an important source of employment are disappointed. I wish to take nothing away from the Minister's popularity in the House, which will doubtless be greatly enhanced by the identity of his successor once it is known.

Mr. Rowlands: Will my hon. Friend try to extract from the Minister answers to two questions regarding the position of direct labour organisations and direct service organisations? I put specific questions which, unfortunately, perhaps due to an oversight on his part, the Minister did not answer. That was why I wanted to intervene.

Mr. Morgan: He is the Minister for oversight in the Welsh Office, so I am not sure whether I can persuade him to rise to the Dispatch Box once again to discuss DLOs and DSOs. Many of those 140,000 people are in DLOs and DSOs and their position is exceptional. Given the Minister's absence of comment on that issue in answer to specific questions, I am none the wiser on how DLOs' and DSOs' continued acquired rights will be covered. We do not want the Minister of State's successor to be hauled before the European Court for sins of omission because the Minister has failed to clarify the matter or give an undertaking that, by the time the Bill returns to the other place, it will be cleared up.

After all—I return briefly to my opening remarks—this is a displaced debate. This is the debate that we should have had in Committee a month ago. The debate that may take place in 10 days' time in the other place should have taken place tonight on Report, with us having had the two bites at the cherry which issues that are so complex and of such life and death importance to the bread and butter earnings of the 140,000 staff in local government in Wales deserve. Those staff should have the benefit of the two bites at the cherry. They will want to know what is said. Ministers also need to be able to take on board the comments that are made tonight.

If the Minister is stumped on the issue of the DSOs and DLOs, that is fair enough. We expect him to be stumped from time to time, as all Ministers are—and he no less and no more than other Ministers. If the debate had taken place in Committee, no doubt the matter would have been clarified by the time that it came to Report. However, on Report, the Minister may be stumped and when the Bill goes to the other place it will be the last opportunity for any clarification. Instead of there being a month between Committee and Report stages, we shall probably have only a week and a half before the Bill is finally dealt with in the other place.

[Mr. Morgan]

We have to meet our constituents in our surgeries or deputations of local government officers. They have every right to expect answers from us. They will say, "We vote for you; damn well find out from those people in Westminster." The chances of our finding out the answers to their questions have been much reduced by the way in which the debate, which should have taken a place a month ago in Committee, has had to take place tonight. It is a thoroughly unsatisfactory state of affairs.

We still do not know to what extent the TUPE regulations will be incorporated and I do not think that we are any the wiser as to whether the Government have made any attempt to take on board last week's European Court of Justice ruling. Has that been incorporated into Government amendment No. 62, or is that a matter that they will now study, going back to the Office of Parliamentary Counsel—who no doubt will be extremely pleased to see them—and saying, "By the time the Bill goes to the other place, we must ensure that this amendment, covering these redundancies and transfer rights, will be incorporated", and further amendments will be made in the Bill's final stages in 10 days' time? That is not satisfactory.

If the Minister will not say anything about DLOs and DSOs or any of the other matters mentioned by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), I must say that there is no doubt that the interference by the Department of the Environment—and perhaps also the Treasury—in that issue has been exceedingly unhelpful. The Secretary of State admitted earlier—something that he obviously did not know when he made his promise at the Dispatch Box on Second Reading—that the Department of the Environment and the Treasury would interfere. He did not know it at the time he made his promise; otherwise, he probably would not have made that promise. He then found out that the Department of the Environment and the Treasury are the big boys in this issue and that he is only the tea boy, and that, unfortunately, he was prevented from doing something that he thought that he had the freedom to do when he promised that this matter would be clarified and sorted out in amendments that would be proposed in Committee in May. Unfortunately, he was prevented from doing that and now the Department of the Environment conditions in England, which are entirely different, will apply.

Wales is a far more rural area than England. People who are displaced in local government in the constituency of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy or of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) cannot obtain other jobs without moving house. That will not be the case in a more urbanised area such as England.

At all times in England there will be a continual flow of different stages of reorganisation, which will not be the case in Wales. We are having the big bang in Wales. It will create an enormous amount of simultaneous confusion and changes in the supply and demand of local government staff, which is not a matter about which the Department of the Environment has to worry. As a result, I have to tell my colleagues that I intend to divide the House on that issue.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 17

GUIDANCE FOR PLANNING

'After section 29 of the planning Act insert—

"29A.—(1) This section shall apply only to Wales.

(2) The Secretary of State shall, after consultation with the Local Planning Authorities concerned, by order designate areas in respect of which the Local Planning Authorities, as and when directed by the Secretary of State, are jointly to prepare guidance for the planning of land-use, transport, economic development and the environment, within those areas.

(3) The timescale for the preparation of such guidance shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State.".' — [Mr. Morgan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Morgan: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause relates to the absence of any guarantees in the Bill for the provision of what might be described as strategic planning, including any equivalent to the powers which we expect to be included in the English local government measure and which have already been included in the Scottish one.

The planning subjects that we want the Secretary of State to instruct the incoming unitary authorities to cover jointly are land use, transportation, economic development and the environment. We understand that the new clause meets with the approval of various lobbying bodies with a specialist interest in planning issues, in both rural and urban Wales. The Council for the Protection of Rural Wales is broadly in favour of its thrust because it understands the problems that might arise if we sub-divide the planning of all sorts of issues—including wind farms, which happen to be the burning issue of the moment in rural Wales.

There are many other issues, including the way in which rural Wales—previously a Cinderella area but now rapidly expanding—handles the subject of land use and the change in the environment. Land consisting virtually entirely of national park or areas of outstanding natural beauty is also extremely attractive to the new society into which we are moving, in which people's choice of housing is not necessarily determined by economic activity. Many people now retire at 50 or decide to go for the good life by leaving London and their careers because they think that their children would be better off brought up in a country environment. Those sorts of conflicts need to be resolved.

In urban Wales there is a desperate desire to resolve the question of where the major employment sites will be. A site may be in one unitary authority area, but it may primarily serve a labour market in an adjoining area. Such issues could be more easily resolved if there were a grouping of special subjects involving two, three or more unitary authorities. That would be for the Secretary of State of the day to decide, in consultation with the unitary authorities. They would then have instructions from the Secretary of State to prepare strategic plans on this, that or the other issue, such as the four listed in the new clause —land use, transportation, economic development and the environment.

The Secretary of State will know that this is in no sense an attempt to reconstruct the counties in some sort of shadowy form over the next 20 years. It is very much in the spirit of the provision in the Scottish local government plans for covering strategic planning against the background of the sub-division of Scotland into smaller, single-tier, most-purpose authorities.

We are going through the same process in Wales, but there is a major difference between Wales and Scotland, and the Secretary of State has never justified it. Why is it that his counterpart in Scotland thinks that there is a continuing need for strategic planning to be carried out in agreement between himself and the Scottish local authorities? We are looking for something similar in Wales. We have tabled new clause 17 in that spirit and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words in support of the new clause and, in particular, of the part concerned with preparing guidance for the planning of land use.

The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs conducted a detailed study of rural housing in Wales and considered the extent to which existing local authorities were or were not complying with existing local and structural plans.

One of the great problems arises from the fact that the Government have decided to ensure that all district councils prepare new local plans—a process that is now well on course. I am delighted that, at last, after many years, the Government have insisted that those new development plans are drawn up. The great difficulty is that now new plans have to be drawn up by the new unitary authorities, so at the very time when local authorities which have in the past resisted drawing up local plans are busy doing exactly that, the Government have introduced a Bill which will mean that they will have to draw up, on the basis of new boundaries, entirely different plans consisting of two parts—one a strategic plan and the other setting out the details of what is intended for public consultation.

The difficulty that that poses for the Welsh Office and for the Government is very clear: to what extent will they intervene in the internal affairs of a local authority when that local authority plainly does not follow Government guidelines?

When we examined the situation in rural Wales, we came across a few district councils that regarded Welsh Office interference in their affairs as extremely unwelcome and considered that the policy planning guidelines were not there to be acceded to. We questioned officials from the Welsh Office on this matter, particularly in relation to Dinefwr borough council. An answer given by Mr. Gregory in his evidence to the Select Committee on 16 June 1993 was extremely helpful in pointing out the Government's position when the draft plan is being prepared by the local authority—and, in view of the Government's proposals, the new unitary authorities.

I am anxious to explore with the Minister the question that arises from Mr. Gregory's sentence. I realise that that gentleman has moved on to greener pastures and I congratulate him on his move to the Department of Health. At column 195 of the Select Committee report, he said in relation to the way in which draft local plans are being drawn up by district councils:

> "Our practice is to ask the authority to explain why it is appropriate in these circumstances, since it does not appear to be, and if the authority cannot explain it, and where personal canvassing is the only reason, it is very difficult for them to do so, then either the authority changes the boundary or we enforce a change.".

What interests me in relation to the Government's proposal is that, when the chief planning officer for the borough of Dinefwr gave evidence in his letter of 6 July 1993, he identified 14 villages within that borough where the local planning committee had decided to overrule the officers' recommendations regarding significant parcels of land that would now be included in the draft local plan for housing development.

Mr. Gregory said that, if the authority continued to proceed in a certain direction, the Welsh Office could be entitled to or could decide to enforce a change. I am interested in the relationship between the new unitary authorities with a new plan and the power of the Welsh Office to enforce that change.

If the local unitary authority is to have the power to determine planning applications with no reference to the county structure plan, will the Welsh Office increase its intervention and its scrutiny of planning in Wales to ensure a consistency across the Principality that plainly did not exist in recent times, as the Select Committee inquiry demonstrated?

The new clause represents an attempt to set up a system which replaces the council city structure plan—which will not exist because the counties will not exist—with a system of checks and balances to ensure some consistency across wider parts of Wales rather than simply within the local authority area.

A fundamental unfairness exists whereby some individuals can get planning permission within a local authority area, entirely against both the local plan and the structural plan, whereas other individuals are unable to get such permission. The clause seeks to address that fundamental issue by trying to establish a system that would help the Welsh Office to avoid the additional burden that any Government Department would attempt to avoid. The clause attempts to ensure that there is fairness within Wales—fairness which, as the Minister knows, did not exist in 1991 when the Select Committee considered the subject in detail.

Is the Minister confident that, under the proposed changes, all the new unitary authorities will have deposited both parts of the new plan by the end of 1996— I refer not to the plans that they have been drawing up but to the new plans—so that there will be some consistency? Secondly, to what extent may we be sure that the Welsh Office will no longer need to watch carefully what each unitary authority is doing in planning terms because checks will exist within them?

It is over-optimistic of the Welsh Office to assume that, if the new clause is rejected, sufficient powers will not only exist but will be used by the Welsh Office to ensure consistency throughout the Principality. We need a replacement for the county structure plan. To rely on the new plans drawn up by district councils without a county structure plan to ensure a fair system throughout Wales will be to create a major problem.

Let me use the analogy of voluntary arrangements among Welsh district councils with regard to waste disposal. The Minister and I spent many happy hours in the Select Committee considering that vexed issue, which took us into consideration of leachate, methane gas and other environmental problems. We also spent many happy hours investigating those problems in situ in different parts of the Principality.

In that instance, there was tremendous inconsistency in the regulation of waste disposal as between district councils. Finally, voluntary agreement was reached between three sets of Welsh district councils, to try to establish a degree of consistency. The difficulties were legendary. I will not describe all 286 landfill sites in Wales that existed in 1987. The majority of district councils were superb in the way that they performed their duties. But some were not. When the voluntary groups existed, certain district councils within them were reluctant to accept from an officer financed by them all instructions as to the action that they should take. I visited some landfill sites and saw leachate entering neighbouring streams; the prosecuting authorities took companies to court and those firms were fined for endangering the life forms in rivers polluted by leachate from tips.

Plainly, the voluntary system did not work. That point applies equally to the provision before us. The Welsh Office needs to play a far more proactive role in carefully examining draft local plans and to use its powers to direct local authorities not to permit development outside village boundaries contrary to planning guidelines.

I cite the example of policy planning guidance note 7 and annexe E, in respect of bungalows and other homes for retirement farmers in Wales. At present, the Select Committee is devising a questionnaire that will be sent to every Welsh district council asking for details of contraventions of that planning guidance.

We already know that since January 1992, in Montgomery district council, three retired farmers have had new homes built on land that they owned. Will the Welsh Office force those farmers to demolish those properties because they are in direct contravention of the Welsh Office PPG? If so—and I appreciate that Montgomery might not survive—the new clause may not be necessary. If it is the Secretary of State's purpose, after the Bill receives Royal Assent, quickly to move in, enforce his powers and direct those few miscreants in Wales to demolish their properties, new clause 17 may be unnecessary. If, however, the Secretary of State allows his PPGs to be flouted as they occasionally are in different areas, the new clause will be necessary to protect people from renegade local planning committee members who give permission as a result of personal considerations being uppermost in their minds.

I can do no better than to refer again to the clear message given in many of the local government commissioners' reports—that although only a small percentage of Welsh district councils are guilty of that practice, their actions bring the whole planning system into disrepute. The commissioners' 1991-92 report stated:

> "One council granted consent for some 48 per cent. of those applications, which were significant departures from the council's own approved policy."

One report on a complaint against the council in question observed:

> "Such a situation can only reflect adversely on the council's credibility as a planning authority."

The Minister has kindly addressed that issue, and I am sure that he will do so again. However, it is vital that the Welsh Office takes a far more interactive and active role in ensuring that planning policy guidance is followed consistently across Wales, so that when draft local plans are drawn up they are closely scrutinised and development approval for a local planning authority member's land contrary to the recommendations of the local authority's own officers will not be tolerated.

The balance between local democracy and central Government is critical. I hope that the Government will either use their powers to ensure consistency or put in place a system to replace the county structure plan as a check, if it happens that the local development plan that the Bill proposes is ineffective. If the new clause is accepted, the Welsh Office will be let off the hook and local democracy will be able to remain paramount. But I am sure, as the Minister is aware, that the people of Wales are not happy with the situation whereby certain councils have been able to give planning permissions without close reference to the law, the statutes and policy planning guidelines. It gives me great pleasure to support the new clause.

6.30 pm

Mr. Llwyd: I speak as a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. It has been a somewhat sobering experience over the past few months to undertake the research and investigation to which the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) referred. There were quite shocking instances of breaches of planning regulations, which, apparently, were dealt with in a very unsatisfactory manner, and with no regard whatever for normal planning guidelines.

I moved a not dissimilar amendment in Committee, which was supported by the Campaign for the Protection of Rural Wales and other Welsh bodies that are actively involved in planning issues in Wales. The core point is that we must have some strategic view of planning in Wales, otherwise we could end up with 21, 22 or 23 different unitary development plans and a very queer patchwork throughout Wales. Another obvious point arising from the new clause is that environmental issues cross development boundaries, and are vitally important; they do not adhere to a particular boundary.

The new clause is highly necessary. Those who are far more proficient than I am in planning matters feel strongly about it. They feel that the current safeguards in the Bill are not appropriate or strong enough and that we might well be left in a very haphazard position were the scenario referred to by the hon. Member for Gower to come about. I sincerely hope that the Government will give further thought to that important issue.

Will the Minister give me an assurance regarding the amendment that I tabled in Committee about the role of community councils? Since tabling that amendment, I have received upwards of 170 responses from community and town councils in Wales, all of them, bar two, supporting it. The Minister may recall that I said that there should be better consultation with community councils and that, if a community or town council wants to meet planning officers, that meeting should take place before any decision is made. I recall the Minister's words. He told me that either a similar amendment would be tabled on Report—which is today—or those words would be incorporated in guidelines issued to the new unitary authorities in their consultation process with the community councils. I trust that the Minister can give me some assurance on that. I fully support the purport of new clause 17.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): I thank the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) for his concise and thoughtful speech. I well recall the much longer debates that we had on the subject in Committee, and his speeches then. I want to give him the assurance that he seeks about the relationship between the new local planning authorities and community councils. I am confident that the arrangements that we have in mind, particularly the guidelines that we intend to issue, will produce exactly the right form of consultations, and that we will see a better arrangement to ensure that the important views of community councils can be heard by the local planning authorities.

I welcome the interest of the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell), who is Chairman of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee. His Committee's inquiries into planning have resulted in a useful working together for the Welsh Office, drawing on the work of the Select Committee. We are taking forward a process of monitoring departure applications, and I am sure that that is exactly the additional monitoring that the Committee wanted us to do. I am grateful for its assistance in that matter.

I am confident that the concept of unitary development plans will be a much better arrangement. It draws together the differences between what is now being done by the county councils and the district councils under one arrangement. I would say to the hon. Gentleman that I am confident that there will be timely progress in taking forward the unitary development plans, building on the work that has already been done by the existing councils.

Each local planning authority will be required to address strategic issues during the preparation and adoption of its unitary development plan. Policies related to the urban and rural economy, transport, planning, environment and conservation are among the topics that will be included in part 1 of the plan. Land use proposals will figure in part 2.

Under the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, authorities will be required to consult adjoining authorities on strategic and other cross-boundary issues. Two or more neighbouring authorities may wish to prepare jointly their unitary development plans. That will be a matter for them. The quality of planning, however, will not be improved by mandatory groupings of authorities. Nor do I feel that they will be helped by having to issue guidance to themselves, because the new clause is very narrow, and the only object that would be achieved by that would be the preparation of joint guidance. Accordingly, I urge the House not to accept the new clause.

Mr. Morgan: That was a disappointing reply, but given the firmness with which it was delivered, it would be pointless to press the matter to a Division. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT AREAS

Mr. Morgan: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 1, line 18, leave out 'Parts I and II' and insert 'Part I'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments:

No. 11, in page 1, line 21, leave out from 'areas' to end of line 23 and insert

'shall be as set out in Part I of Schedule 4 and shall be counties, save that a county may become a county borough under the provisions of section 245A of this Act.'.

Government amendments Nos. 41 to 47.

No. 16, in schedule 1, page 52, line 5, leave out 'Part I' and insert 'Parts I and II'.

No. 17, in page 53, leave out lines 15 to 19.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to have the opportunity to move on to the question of the Government's persistence in their erroneous ways of attempting to divide the new world of unitary local government in Wales into two classes. The Government are, perhaps, wedded to two-tierism. We are a two-tier society. We have a two-tier health service and now we are to have two-tier local government in Wales—on the one hand through an attempt to rationalise Wales by having unitary local government and, on the other, the absurd attempt, which, in spite of all our attempts, so far has been resisted by the Government, to break up local government and make it class conscious almost before it comes into existence under the new unitary scheme.

As you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will see, with reference to amendments Nos. 16 and 17, which come at the end of this group of amendments, the schedules on pages 52 to 55 of the Bill lay out the names of the new authorities as though they were two cricket teams to be played against each other—as though they were gentlemen and players or, in some way, a class A and class B of new local authorities.

There is no purpose to that at all. It is purely related to status, not to function. I should have thought that the whole spirit of the Bill would follow the principle that we are trying to persuade those new local authorities to think about their functions as being 100 per cent. of the job in front of them, not their status. To make local authorities status conscious from day one and to discriminate between two groups of local authorities so that they have different status is patently absurd and absolutely not what the Government should be doing. Any casual glance at parts I and II of the schedules makes that quite clear. That is why in amendments Nos. 16 and 17 we abolish the distinction between part I and part II. Amendments Nos. 10 and 11, which we are initially discussing, are the ways of bringing that into the text of the main part of the Bill.

Government amendments Nos. 41 to 47 are minor technical amendments, relating to the freedom of authorities to drop such words as "county" and "shire" from their titles. We need not spend much time on them; our time should be spent asking the Government yet again to reconsider the grouping of authorities into two classes.

A particularly absurd aspect of the proposals is the fact that, although class A is clearly meant to be more important than class B, authorities can ask to move from class A to class B—in other words, they can ask to downgrade themselves to the second division—but cannot do the reverse. Authorities currently listed in schedule 1 are, in effect, being told, "You are the important ones, but if you decide that you want a mayor"—or, in the case of the cities of Wales, Cardiff and Swansea, a lord mayor; that is their historic right—"you must move into the second division."

That is patently absurd. The fact that authorities should be placed on a pedestal and then asked to lower themselves from the first to the second division if they want the status involved in having a lord mayor beggars belief. It would be much simpler to recognise cities' historic rights—and those of county boroughs, which, being already in the second division, automatically have mayors. The fact that Cardiff and Swansea are being required to ask the Secretary of State's permission to move into part II and, as it were, downgrade themselves because of the discriminatory nature of the legislation makes me wonder what the Government thought that they were doing in dividing the schedule into two parts, listing about 22 areas.

The Government should try to simplify and rationalise the Bill. The Secretary of State should employ the intellectual incisiveness for which he was famed as a university student. He should consider whether the Bill would be neater if it concentrated more on the functions of local government and less on the difference between the first and second divisions.

It would be better to create a single class of unitary authorities. The cities could then have their lord mayors, areas whose historical or geographical orientation makes them counties could have their chairmen and chairwomen, and historic boroughs could have their mayors: no authority would have to jump from one class to another.

It is not necessary to draw up two classes. All that is necessary is a schedule listing all the local authorities in Wales, so that none is distinguished on the basis of status, but the title of each clearly implies whether it is an historic shire, an historic city or an historic borough.

The present "division 1" contains both present cities and present shires; it is not as though different types of authority area are being described. Division 1 contains shires and cities, while division 2 contains boroughs. If a city wants a lord mayor, however, it must jump from the county list to the borough list. That underlines the absurdity of the Government's obsession with creating two classes. They originate from a class-ridden society, and they are now creating another.

The list of local authority titles should be simple and rational. There is absolutely no purpose in dividing the schedule into two parts, comprising two apparently counterposed lists of local authorities which will be set aside from day one as though they differed in status—as opposed to powers. We do not want status-conscious local authorities; we want function-conscious authorities, anxious to do a job and orientated towards providing services for their citizens. The schedule starts the Bill off on the wrong foot, and will have the same effect on local authorities. I hope that the Government will reconsider.

Mr. Hain: I wish to press the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on a specific issue—the title of the new Neath and Port Talbot unitary authority. That title excludes a significant part of the new authority: upper Lliw, the upper Swansea valley and the lower Amman valley.

Schedule 15 states:

> "The name of a Welsh principal area shall not be changed under this section before 1st October 1996 except with the consent of the Secretary of State."

Let us suppose that, having been elected—even with "shadow" status—a new unitary authority decides that, in order better to reflect its composition, it wishes to change its name. I see the Secretary of State nodding appreciatively: that is an unusual experience for me, and it may harm his reputation, but I hope that he will consider this matter sympathetically. Such action would be well received, and would provide certain reassurances. The right hon. Gentleman nods again; this is becoming dangerously repetitive.

As the Minister will appreciate, there is a proud tradition in the upper Swansea valley—which contains such towns as Ystalyfera, Pontardawe and Cwmllynfell —and the lower Amman valley, which contains Gwaun-Cae-Gurwen. Those towns—and even the little village of Rhiwfawr—do not feel that they can easily be associated with Port Talbot; they have a certain association with Neath because they are in the Neath constituency.

I realise that playing around with names on the Floor of the House of Commons could be seen as a dangerous pursuit for a sitting Member of Parliament; playing around with boundaries is dangerous enough, but playing around with names may be even more hazardous. I do not seek to impose any alternative name on the new authority—that is a matter for the new members—but the Bill contains an unsatisfactory element, in that it excludes a sizeable slice of the new authority which has an important tradition and identity and proud local communities.

Suggestions have been made, and I pass them on without prejudice in any direction. "New Glamorgan" has been suggested; some have even suggested "the Neath Valleys"—a certain territorialism may be involved there. I do not think that Port Talbot would be terribly impressed. There is, however, a serious problem: the title of the new authority must give it an identity that is known to the outside world.

I understand why the Secretary of State may have gone for this option. At least Neath and Port Talbot are two relatively well-known names in Wales—Neath is, anyway —in terms of rugby and politics. That gives the area an identity: investors and visitors know where it is. I can see the logic. A more anodyne name such as "New Glamorgan" might run the contrary risk of making the area relatively anonymous.

I understand the difficulties involved, but I hope that the Secretary of State will give sympathetic consideration to any request not just from the fully constituted operational authority but from the shadow authority to set itself up on an entirely fresh basis, taking into account the important local feelings of pride and identity that exist in the upper Lliw valley. Certainly, the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has nodded vigorously at me suggests that he will do so.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The nomenclature of the areas presents a special problem for my constituency. Although Newport is generally happy with the Bill's provisions, it faces a unique problem: there are Newports in Wales and throughout the world, as a result of which much confusion has arisen. A couple of months ago, I received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, in which he stated that he would visit an agricultural college in my constituency. I wrote back to say that I would be to happy to meet him and search for it and that, if we could not find it, he could meet the local Child Support Agency action group so that his trip would not be entirely wasted.

Newports are constantly confused. To establish the identity of the area, it should be given another name. For most of this century, the area was called Newport Monmouthshire. Since 1974, it has been known as Newport Gwent, which has become the established name. We are told by the Post Office, however, that once the Bill is enacted, we shall have to start calling it Newport, Newport, to which some objections have been made.

We commonly refer to our neighbour, the city of Cardiff, as "Newport, far west", which might be a suitable title if it is considering changing its name.

The problem, which dates back through the history of Newport, is what to call ourselves. There is only one Casnewydd in Wales: Casnewyyd Ar Wysg is the Welsh version of Newport. The River Usk flows through the town. Usk means water and is found in the word "Eskdale". One popular suggestion is that the town should change its name to Newport on Usk, which has a certain attraction and might be popular.

Our status is not accepted as permanent. Newport has long aspired to becoming a city. Newport County, a football team of great renown, is sadly no longer with us. Perhaps we could call ourselves Newport City and wait for the Queen or whoever is in charge of such matters to vest city status on Newport. The name of Newport presents special problems which no other areas experience.

Newport has an enormously important and unique history in Wales. Certain parts of it are booming, despite the policies of the Government, in whom we are all beginning to lose faith, especially after the last couple of days. Newport still has a great future and a rugged, robust personality and character. Those matters must be borne in mind.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Amendments Nos. 41 to 47 respond to an amendment tabled in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans). After consideration, we have decided that it would be right to give the new councils a degree of flexibility to determine their official title. In addition to the titles of county council and county borough council, the amendment would create a third form of plain council. It does not alter the legal status of the new authorities—they will still be counties or county boroughs—but it will permit an authority to be known simply as a council, as in Monmouthshire council or Pembrokeshire council. I commend the Government amendments to the House.

I noted the concern of the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) about the title of the authority now designated as Neath and Port Talbot. He will recollect that in Committee we passed an amendment that shortened the period in which the new authorities would require my right hon. Friend's permission to change their title. I assure him that my right hon. Friend remains sympathetic to any application, even while the authority is in shadow form. We are prepared to consider whatever application is made.

I recognise Newport's aspirations to become a city. Speaking as a citizen of the capital city of Wales, I regard that as a fine aspiration. On the basic conundrum about the title of the authority for Newport, I can but leave that with the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn).

I assure the Opposition that there is no difference between county and county boroughs in terms of status, functions or responsibilities. The two designations were chosen because they are resonant of the traditional pre-1974 structures of local government, when county boroughs were unitary authorities and the administrative counties were responsible for almost all significant functions of local government in non-county borough areas. There is no reason, therefore, to pursue amendments Nos. 10, 11, 16 or 17.

Mr. Morgan: That answer was absurd. There was no difference before 1974. If one had two-tier local government, one had two-tier local government. The boroughs in the old county areas and the counties split functions between them. It is not valid to say that the counties were so predominant in their areas that they were almost all-purpose authorities—they were not. Anyone who was involved in borough government before 1974 knows that the counties and the boroughs split their functions. They were unlike county boroughs of Cardiff, Newport Swansea and Merthyr.

My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) made some valid points about the need to recognise the contribution that the upper Swansea valley has made to cultural life in Wales. I have strong family connections with that area, which has produced more Welsh rugby captains per head than any other part of Wales: I list only Claude Davey, R.H. Williams, Clem Thomas, Clive Rowlands and Gareth Edwards. The contribution of that area, therefore, should be recognised. I shall leave it to my hon. Friend and his constituents to work how that should be done. Perhaps a petition could be presented to Her Majesty, provision for which is included in clause 245.

If one comes from Cardiff, the issue involving Newport is a much trickier question. I have suggested that Cardiff may become known as the Latin quarter of Newport, although not in proceedings in the House. Cardiff is losing some of its industry, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) said, Newport remains very much part of the world of work and industry—not something that I necessarily approve of.

The question of city status for Newport is affected by the problem that I referred to earlier. The schedule has been broken up into parts 1 and II. Inevitably, Newport will read the list. As the biggest and most historic town in division 2, it will naturally ask how it can be promoted to division 1. There is no provision to permit that. Cardiff and Swansea can apply to leave division 1 and go into division 2—they will have to if they are to have lord mayors. How will Newport get from division 2 into division 1? That is a great difficulty.

Newport has a great history, including something of a football history. In Frederick Raphael's "Glittering Prizes" the bright young things at Cambridge were asked whether they would prefer playing football to working for the BBC, Shell or BP. One said that he would have given up all the A-levels in the world to score a hat-trick for Newport County reserves. As Newport had been bottom of the Football League for five years running at the time, that was a mark of how they valued football above academic prestige, despite the glittering prizes of the Oxbridge world.

The problem would be solved by removing the distinction between part I and part II in the schedule. If the Government resist, I hope they will listen to the world of local government and will recognise that status in the new Wales does not count but function does. By the time the Bill goes to the other place, I hope that they will have thought again. In the circumstances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 2

CONSTITUTION OF NEW PRINCIPAL COUNCILS IN WALES

No. 47, in page 3, line 10, after 'Caerffili"' insert 'or "Cyngor Caerffili"'.—[Mr. Gwilym Jones.]

7 pm

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 3, line 11, leave out 'Caerdydd and Abertawe' and insert 'Abertawe, Caerdydd and Powys'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following: Amendment No. 23, in schedule 1, page 52, leave out lines 11 and 12 and insert—

'Breconshire and Radnorshire Sir Brycheiniog and Sir Faesyfed	The districts of Brecknock and Radnorshire.'.

Government amendments Nos. 76 to 82.

Mr. Jones: We have listened carefully to the arguments for separate authorities for Breconshire, Montgomeryshire and Radnorshire. The Government remain strongly of the view that each of the three districts within Powys is too small to be a self-standing unitary authority with all that that entails in terms of taking responsibility for the full range of local government services.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The Under-Secretary of State said something interesting and important. If Montgomeryshire is too small to be a free-standing local authority, why are not Rutlandshire, Huntingdonshire and Clackmannanshire too small to be free-standing local authorities?

Mr. Jones: This is a matter for consideration by the House and I am giving the House our advice on the subject.

The Government are alive to the concerns of people in Montgomeryshire, Brecknock and Radnorshire who want to preserve the identities of the old counties. We believe that that can be achieved within the context of the proposals in the Bill. The provisions in clause 27 and the new clauses that the House has already considered will provide the shire committees which will allow a real measure of decentralisation of responsibility and accountability for local services to local representatives.

On amendments Nos. 77, 81 and 82, we have given further careful consideration to this matter. On balance we feel that the community of Llanelly has closer affinities with areas in the proposed new authority of Monmouthshire. Lines of communication, social, economic and cultural links between the community and places such as Abergavenny, Govilon and Llanfoist appear to be much stronger than with places such as Crickhowell in Powys. Our conclusion also takes account of representations such as the petition of 1,900 signatures presented to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) and the poll conducted by Blaenau Gwent borough council on 24 February, which showed that the Monmouthshire "option" was the most popular among electors in Llanelly. Accordingly, we propose that Llanelly hill should be within Monmouthshire.

Mr. Alex Carlile: What we have just heard is an insult to the House. If the Under-Secretary of State believed what he said, he would not have read it at such breakneck speed. There is an old horse racing expression to the effect that the jockey cannot come without the horse. What we heard was a horseless statement read by a tired jockey who did not believe in his capacity to finish the race, let alone to win it.

The Secretary of State reminded us yesterday of his speech at a Conservative party conference when he spoke of the identity that people felt with certain traditional communities. He helpfully reminded us of how he spoke in terms which meant that people could have their Rutlandshire and their Huntingdonshire—communities just like Montgomeryshire and Merionethshire, and just the sort of communities that we won back into the Bill in Committee.

I apprehend that if the Secretary of State, then the Minister responsible for local government, had been asked to include some Welsh communities in his speech at that time he would have added Montgomeryshire and Merionethshire and he would have done it without any compunction whatever.

Mr. Rowlands: His predecessor did.

Mr. Carlile: Yes. As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) reminds me, the Secretary of State's predecessor did just that.

We have been over this ground before and I do not want to tread over rocky old ground again or repeat what has been said many times, so I shall not do so; it is all on the record. However, on behalf of my constituents I have to say that the paucity and threadbare nature of the Under-Secretary of State's answer to my intervention really gave the game away. For some hidden, obscure and politically motivated reason the Government have decided that Montgomeryshire and Merionethshire should no longer exist as local government areas. Having thus far represented Montgomeryshire for 11 years and a few days, it gives me great sadness to be here on the day when it has been decided that Montgomeryshire shall no longer have a council with a legal personality which can say, "We are the entity of Montgomeryshire." The last vestige of the old county of Montgomeryshire will be the continuation of the constituency of Montgomery in Parliament.The demise of Montgomeryshire as a council area was not wanted by the public and it will never be accepted by them. The Government must know that by forcing through this unwelcome change in local government boundaries and status they have failed to achieve the consensus that I am sure they hoped at the outset to achieve. It is inevitable that we shall return to local government reform in due course and give back to Montgomeryshire the council that it wants and deserves.

During the debates in Committee there was some welcome support from the hon. Members for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) and for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley). The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge, as we rehearsed in Committee, has a distinguished residential and business connection with Montgomeryshire. He fully understands that Montgomeryshire should be a county council in its own right. I suspect that he would recognise that there was an easy and straightforward option for the Government—to have a unitary Montgomeryshire and a unitary combined Brecon and Radnor. Although they may deny it now, I suspect that if the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor had told Ministers at a much earlier stage that he would settle for a combined Brecon and Radnor, that is what we would have got.

I fear that at the bottom of all this are political considerations concerning the constituency of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor. I do not want to be unduly unfair to him—indeed, I believe that I shall be very fair to him. He acted courageously in opposing his party's Government and we know that as a result he had to take his toe off the lower rung of the ministerial ladder, although that may be only temporary. I informed the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor that I intended to make these comments and I believe that they should be put on the record. I am convinced that at an early stage in the deliberations he made a serious error of judgment and he has become one of the authors of the destruction of Montgomeryshire as a local authority. I believe that his judgment was wrong in refusing to agree to a joint Brecon and Radnor unitary authority: in terms of jobs and accountability, it would have been far better for his constituency than the Powys pudding with which we are left.

As I have said, I believe that the Government would have agreed to the two-unit option for mid-Wales had the hon. Gentleman supported it. His actions in Committee, welcome as they were, may in the final analysis seem more like self-immolation than rebellion. I believe that his constituents in Radnor as well as in Breconshire would have understood a decision of the type that I require. I believe that in Radnorshire they would understand far better a situation in which they would have had a unitary authority combined with Breconshire than the situation that they are likely to face as a result, which is likely to be a Powys in which there will be shire committees for Montgomeryshire and Breconshire but not for Radnorshire. So we now face the situation that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor has brought on his own constituents of Radnorshire of having every decision made by committees with representatives from Breconshire and Montgomeryshire.

I believe that by Government amendment No. 54 the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor has been doublecrossed by the Government. He believed that it would take only 10 councillors from Radnorshire to have a shire committee, but now it will be 15 unless we achieve the unlikely result of defeating the Government a little later on. As a result, part of his own constituency will be seriously disadvantaged. I am sorry that I had to put that on the record, because I respect the hon. Gentleman for the course that he took in Committee, but when people look back on our debates that is one of the judgments that will be made.

As I have said, it is a very sad occasion to see the burial tonight of Montgomeryshire as a local authority. Montgomeryshire has existed for centuries and is well understood both within and outside Wales as being a distinguished old county. It has produced great citizens and contributors to the national life of the country and further afield, ranging across all walks of life, such as Robert Jones, perhaps one of the greatest of all social reformers, as well as great lawyers, great public figures, great statesmen, and great teachers who almost invaded London from Montgomeryshire by tradition. The dairies of London were known to be run by people from Meirionnyddshire and Montgomeryshire.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): And Caernarfonshire.

Mr. Carlile: And Caernarfonshire. Montgomeryshire has been part of the national heritage but tonight, apparently, we are to see it go. I regret that, and I believe that many hon. Members in the House—even on the Government side—privately share my regret.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): I will deal first with the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). Sadly, during the entire debate, the one thing that he has not recognised is that the claims of Radnorshire to independent unitary authority status are just as good as those of Montgomeryshire. I do not blame him for advancing the claim of Montgomeryshire above all else but, sadly, his remarks tonight have demonstrated that he has not appreciated that the cause of Radnorshire stands alongside the cause of Montgomeryshire and that Montgomeryshire is not to be preferred.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), in his sorry contribution to our debate yesterday, expressed his certainty that I would find myself defeated on the part of Bill before us. He then tried to claim some narrow, party political advantage for himself from such a defeat. I begin by reminding the hon. Gentleman, who may not have understood this, that we are now debating the Government's proposals to overturn the decision of the Standing Committee on amendment No. 44, tabled by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and supported by the hon. Gentleman himself. He, on the Opposition Front Bench, signed that amendment. Accordingly, in his failure to mobilise the Labour party in support of the amendment, the hon. Gentleman is demonstrating a failure to support the very amendment that he proposed and the passing of which he managed to achieve in Committee.

It was not an insignificant event. The somewhat noisy hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy)—I am sorry that he is leaving the Chamber—described it as the first Committee on which he had sat in which he had witnessed significant Government defeats. Another so far unnamed Labour Member reported to television Lobby journalists later that it had been the most exciting moment in all his time as a Member of the House. Yet today we have the sorry spectacle of the hon. Member for Caerphilly on the Opposition Front Bench aspiring to be the leader of political life in Wales but unable or unwilling to achieve the support of his colleagues to defend the success in Committee of which he boasted so much.

It is all so very different, I am sad to say, from the easy promises made by the hon. Member for Caerphilly in earlier debates. On Second Reading, he promised the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery:

> "I shall give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to vote on whether Powys should continue as a unitary authority . . . I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is my firm intention to support him."—[Official Report, 15 March 1994; Vol. 239, c. 759.]

We know that it was his firm intention to turn up, but that he was incapable of persuading the people whom he aspires to lead to be here to support him.

We heard so much yesterday about the hon. Gentleman's disappointment with my votes in Committee. His first response to me in Committee appeared as early as column 8, when he said:

> "The only thing that I want the hear from the hon. Gentleman is an 'Aye' when we vote on the creation of the county of Brecon."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 12 April 1994; c. 8.]

I might want to hear that sort of support from those who —supposedly—are behind the hon. Gentleman, but sadly he has been unable to bring them along today.

7.15 pm

Furthermore, just before the vote was taken in Committee the hon. Gentleman bravely stated:

> "I urge my hon. Friends to support the amendment" and as an admonition to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) he said:

> "and I urge the Under-Secretary to understand that if the amendment is accepted," as it was accepted,

> "it will not just be", to use an expression which no doubt trips off the hon. Gentleman's tongue,

> "to pull a fast one on the Government or to cause inconvenience, but to reflect the fact that the Government have got it wrong."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 19 April 1994; c. 103.]

If the Government have indeed got it wrong, it is a sad event that the hon. Gentleman cannot produce his supporters to demonstrate that by defending the change that was made in Committee.

Even after the vote had been taken, the hon. Gentleman again was quite outspoken in Committee. He said:

> "I assure the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor that . . . he will find Labour Members staunch allies in his cause"—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 21 April 1994; c. 112.]

That is all very different from the remarks that we heard subsequently in the House yesterday from the hon. Member for Caerphilly.

Some have said that the hon. Gentleman has abandoned me. For my own part, I believe that the hon. Gentleman, who aspires to be a future Secretary of State for Wales, has abandoned the people of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire and Breconshire. I asked the hon. Gentleman yesterday what he had said to the leaders of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire—

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly) rose—

Mr. Evans: I will give way in a moment. I asked the hon. Gentleman yesterday what he had said to the leaders of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire and Breconshire when they met him yesterday to plead their cause. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to respond, I will give way.

Mr. Ron Davies: I shall certainly respond in a moment to the case that the hon. Gentleman is trying to construct. First, I should put it on the record that the votes of his party's Government and his colleagues on the Conservative Benches will bring about the defeat of the proposal for which he argued in Committee.

All that I and my hon. Friends have said stands. We are in favour of the creation of three unitary authorities in Montgomeryshire, Breconshire and Radnorshire. When the appropriate time comes, I shall recommend to my hon. Friends that that is the course of action that we should take and that is course of action that I shall take, consistent with all my previous statements.

Mr. Evans: If I may say so, the hon. Gentleman gave a rather different response to the leaders of Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire and Breconshire yesterday. He told them that he had achieved a major concession from the Secretary of State for Wales. They asked what was that prize and what was the price extracted by this tough negotiator, the hon. Member for Caerphilly. Rumours abounded yesterday that it may be an independent Cynon valley authority, or was it to be an independent Neath or Rhondda? No. The hon. Gentleman proudly gloated to those leaders over his achievement. He said that the Secretary of State had agreed to allow him a vote at 6 o'clock on his half-baked referendum amendment. That was it. The greatest achievement of the man who aspires to be the Secretary of State for Wales, negotiating and fighting for Wales in Europe and beyond, is to have a say in the timetabling of his own failures. Having landed on the beaches of Normandy, the leadership skills of the hon. Gentleman would have allowed him to crawl back into the sea with the kind agreement of the enemy.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to speak at such length without mentioning any part of the amendment that we are attempting to debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman was in order, and he is responsible for his own speech. If he had not been in order, the Chair would have said so.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Clearly, my remarks are causing difficulties for Opposition Members. To round off my remarks about the conduct of the hon. Member for Caerphilly, I point out that he yesterday twice congratulated the Secretary of State on his birthday; with an opponent with the talents of the hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State must believe that every day is his birthday.

Paragraph 1.6 of the Government's consultation paper issued in 1991 declared that

> "local authority boundaries should as far as possible reflect and strengthen existing community loyalties".

On the eve of the general election, in March 1992, the then Secretary of State for Wales said that he would

> "consult further on whether to extend that approach"— of local government based on the traditional counties—

> "to separate authorities for Radnorshire and Brecknock."—[Official Report, 3 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 171.]

My consistent response to that consultation has been to press the case for unitary authorities in my constituency based on the traditional shire counties.

By 1993 the Government had decided to propose a single Powys-wide unitary authority. However, even they recognised the immense practical difficulties of establishing such an authority without effective decentralisation measures. The Secretary of State has suggested that the powers short of full unitary status could be exercised by area committees which, it was proposed in earlier debates, could even be called county committees. However, the flaw in the Government's argument is that, without real financial accountability, area committees cannot deal with the need for local autonomy in the shire counties in mid-Wales.

As the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said, Government amendment No. 54 will effectively ensure that Radnorshire will be unable to apply for any decentralisation scheme. By setting the trigger number of councillors at 15, the Secretary of State has virtually ensured that decisions in Radnorshire will be made by councillors drawn from Montgomeryshire, Breconshire and Radnorshire itself.

I do not charge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State with the duplicity or the grubby pursuit of party political advantage shown by the hon. Member for Caerphilly. The Secretary of State has always supported a centralised Powys authority and he has maintained the view that smaller authorities—those with under 50,000 people—cannot be permitted in Wales. The chief executives of the two district councils in my constituency, others in Caerphilly and people in Wales of all parties have made sterling efforts. I give credit to the Labour groups in my constituency which have strongly supported my arguments for the establishment of authorities based on Breconshire and Radnorshire. We have even cited Touche Ross, the Government's own advisers, who have shown that the proposals would be cost neutral.

The Secretary of State is well aware that authorities established under the Scottish arrangements will be smaller than those proposed in the Bill. He is also aware that last Friday the independent Local Government Commission for England proposed a unitary authority for Rutland. That decision has undoubtedly been of great comfort to some of my English colleagues. I note, however, that on the very day that Rutland was proposed, the Secretary of State tabled amendments to ensure that the equivalent case for Montgomeryshire, Breconshire and Radnorshire was rejected.

Twenty years ago, Nicholas Edwards and Sir Raymond Gower carried their objections to the structural reform of Welsh local government into the Division Lobbies. Their views were rejected by the Conservative Government of the day, and they were defeated. With this Bill, the Government are recognising that they were right after all and they have re-established unitary council status for Pembrokeshire. It is ironic that in correcting that perceived injustice the Government have, with the connivance of the hon. Member for Caerphilly, committed as great an injustice in these amendments against the people of mid-Wales.

Mr. Llwyd: I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I do not intend to get involved in a party political slanging match because, at the end of the day, we are talking about the delivery of services to the people of mid-Wales. If the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) were serious about the shire counties of mid-Wales being reinstated, why did he turn his back on the people of Meirionnydd?

Labour Members, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and I were fully supportive of the hon. Gentleman's case on the basis that separate shire authorities for the whole of mid-Wales could work together happily on developmental, structural and economic grounds. In addition, we knew that a review of the workings of the Development Board for Rural Wales was imminent. That was one of the mainsprings of the argument made by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor but, alas, he then turned his back on the people of Meirionnydd. Even worse, he tried to persuade me not to push the matter to a Division because he said that he was confident that we would win tonight. I do not accept Tory advice at any time, but I am especially pleased that I did not accept it in this instance.

The hon. Gentleman is single-handedly responsible for the loss of Meirionnydd. Meirionnydd has existed since the immediate post-Roman times. His Conservative friend who will stand against me at the next election will have a torrid time of it when he embarks on his pathetic campaign trail.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The hon. Gentleman will confirm that, when we had our material discussion, he maintained that he would be able to organise a vote on Report. We are not able to debate the position of Meirionnydd at this point because he forced the matter to a Division. Furthermore, how I might have voted would not have affected the outcome.

Mr. Llwyd: I am not in a position to guarantee Opposition votes and I did not claim that I was. The hon. Gentleman should know better than to make such palpably ridiculous charges. I could not guarantee that Opposition Members would vote for the amendments because I am in no way involved with the official Opposition. His statement is palpably untrue, but I shall leave it there.

Despite having existed for centuries, the historic counties of Montgomeryshire and Meirionnydd are to disappear because of the Government. My position is similar to that of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. We were both assured by the previous Secretary of State, who respected Welsh history and culture, that there would not be a problem. He said that our counties would be reinstated. In the light of that assurance, the hon. and learned Gentleman and I were happy. I shall not dwell on the skulduggery that has taken place since January—[Interruption.] I hear some Conservative Members making sedentary comments. They have not participated in the debate so far but, if they wish to do so, I shall give way to them. However, if they merely want to make a noise, there is plenty of room for them to do so outside the Chamber. This is a serious matter.

It angers me that we are faced with the effective extinction of historic counties for narrow party political ends. As the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said, I have no doubt that we shall soon again debate local government in Wales as the Bill is flawed. It will need to be reviewed shortly, and I have no doubt that the saying "Tra môr, tra Meirion" will come through once again.

I am appalled at the way in which the Government have seen fit to ignore the views of 13,000 petitioners from Meirionnydd and the hundreds of letters that have been written by various people from all political persuasions, and taken this step. It makes me even more angry that the Prime Minister, in congratulating the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan)—the hon. Gentleman is in the Chamber and I wish him good luck—should give his seal of approval to a county that has a similar history to Meirionnydd and Montgomery, yet we as Welsh people in this Parliament are denied our rights. I have no doubt that our constituents will look to the Conservative party at the next election and rue the day that this happened.

7.30 pm

Mr. Warren Hawksley (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I declare an interest which is in the Register of Members' Interests: my wife and I own a hotel in Montgomeryshire. I therefore have the pleasure of living in Montgomeryshire, seeing how Montgomeryshire district council operates and seeing how popular it is with local people, especially compared with the remote Powys county council.

I shall be brief. I felt that it was an insult that the Minister's introduction to the amendments took only two minutes. I had hoped that we would have a longer explanation of exactly what has happened since the Committee stage. I had hoped that the Minister would discuss why the second-best alternative of financial autonomy for the three area committees, which was dealt with last night, was not a starter. I understand that the proposal was put to the Department of the Environment on Monday this week. Why was it not dealt with earlier so that the various Departments could study the proposal more fully to see whether it was a runner?

On Friday, the proposal that Rutland should have its own authority was announced. That was an important decision, which was welcomed at Prime Minister's Question Time today. It is extraordinary that, within hours of the Prime Minister's welcoming the decision, a proposal which was accepted in Committee, and which would have resulted in a similar situation, was overturned by the Government. The Rutland case is by far the most important thing that has happened since the Committee stage.

Undoubtedly, the proposals as agreed in Committee, with the support of two of my hon. Friends, have the support of the public. Public opinion polls have shown that. The comments that I heard when I was back at my hotel show that there is terrific support for the proposals that were agreed in Committee. We heard in Committee about the support from the community councils. The lower tier of local government wanted to retain the three authorities, and that is important.

I have lived most of my life in the border counties; I was born just over the border in Shropshire. As I moved into a county in 1992, I was interested to see that the Government proposed that the county of Montgomeryshire should be saved and should be the unitary authority. I welcomed the proposal at the time. In Committee, I quoted the words of the then chairman of the Conservative Association when an election meeting was addressed by the then Secretary of State for Wales. The chairman of the Conservative Association said that he was pleased to be back in Montgomeryshire and looked forward to its becoming a unitary authority. I can understand why not only the Liberal Democrat, Plaid Cymru and Labour supporters but the Conservative supporters in Montgomeryshire felt let down by the Secretary of State when he came forward with the proposals at this late stage after the election.

I regret that we need to fight again the fight that we fought and won in Committee. I am disappointed at Labour's attitude. Labour Members tried to explain that they would support this vote. I hope that we will see more than 70 Labour Members paraded in a few moments when we vote on the amendment. If that is all they can get to support the three authorities, it is a fairly poor show and the decision will rest with them. Some of my hon. Friends will support the Opposition parties in opposing the amendment. It will be interesting to see how many socialists go into the Lobby to support those of us who fought hard for the three counties.

It is a sad night. As the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said, it is probably the end of the county of Montgomeryshire. I shall vote with a heavy heart against the Government's amendment. The Government should honour their election pledge to bring back a unitary authority for Montgomeryshire. I hope that Labour will produce enough votes tonight to join those of my hon. Friends, including my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), and other Opposition Members to defeat the Government's proposal. It lets down the electors of Montgomeryshire.

Mr. Ron Davies: Normally, I do not take much notice of the comments of the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley) because he has no mandate to speak on this matter in the House.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley) has every right to be heard in the House. Should not the statement of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) be challenged?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley) has just been heard.

Mr. Davies: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was saying that, as far as I am concerned, the hon. Gentleman does not have a mandate on this matter. He does not have a constituency in Wales and he does not have the vote of one person living in Wales. The only interest that he has is the financial interest that he happens to have in his constituency.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): He is in the House.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman knows all about financial interests; he was disgraced as a result of his financial dealings with the city of Westminster. If the hon. Gentleman wants to discuss the question of financial probity, I am more than happy to give way to him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We should dispense with the insults and get back to the debate.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge said that he would be interested to know how many socialists will be in the Lobby tonight. I venture to suggest that he is asking the wrong question. The question that he should ask is how many Tory Members will be in the Lobby to defend the interests of Montgomery, Brecon and Radnor. Having asked that question, he should then ask how many of them will be in the Lobby to ensure the destruction of unitary authority status for Montgomeryshire, Breconshire and Radnorshire, because they will decide the outcome of the vote.

I shall briefly restate the position that the Labour party has consistently held on this matter. During the statement made in the House when the White Paper was produced, I announced my support and that of my party. I referred specifically to the case made for Montgomery and Montgomeryshire. By implication, my statement of support for Montgomeryshire implied support for the case made for unitary authorities for Brecon and Radnor. The case has been made by those councils for the people of those areas. They made their own case, and it was supported admirably by the Council of Welsh Districts.

In Committee, the case was argued compellingly by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans). I acknowledge the role that they played. The motion was carried because of the votes of Labour Members. We supported the case made for Montgomeryshire and Brecon and Radnor because we believed in the principle of self-determination. We also accepted the viability of those three authorities. The case for them will also be strengthened enormously when we have a Welsh assembly, which will be able to ensure that the necessary support and co-ordination for strategic services are given.

It was clear at an early stage that the Government were not prepared to accept those amendments, which were carried against the Minister's wishes.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Was the hon. Gentleman aware that, during the past few minutes, it has been revealed that the Government intend to abandon Government amendment No. 54 and that it will require only 10 members from an area to ask for an area committee?

[Mr. Alex Carlile]

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the Government can make that concession at this late stage—I express my appreciation of it—it would be appropriate for the Secretary of State to have a rethink on unitary authorities, too, and that the House would appreciate that?

Mr. Davies: That was a dramatic intervention. If I replied to the hon. and learned Gentleman in full, I would have to divulge some of the inner workings of this place. I see that the Liberal Democrat Chief Whip is in position and that the Secretary of State is becoming embarrassed. I am a former Whip, so I am not prepared to divulge all the secrets, but I shall reply directly to the hon. and learned Gentleman's question. Yes, I was aware of that and asked my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), who does not normally figure in these debates as he is an Opposition Whip, to consult the hon. and learned Gentleman.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery will know that when we debated the matter yesterday I expressed my scepticism because the concession that he was seeking would have made the creation of area committees that much easier, which would have had a destructive effect on many of the communities in Wales that we have discussed. I believe that it will be a force for instability. I recognise, however, that the Government are trying to make some concession, presumably to appease the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor, because that will allow the re-creation of an area committee for Radnor which, as the hon. Gentleman demonstrated concisely in Committee, would be denied by Government amendment No. 54.

I suggested to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central that he consult the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. I am persuadable on the matter. If he feels that the Opposition should comply with the withdrawal of Government. amendment No. 54, we will consider doing so.

I must place on record, however, the fact that my colleagues and I want to give the strongest possible support to unitary status for Montgomery, Brecon and Radnor. The proposals contained in the decentralisation measure do not provide a recipe for dealing with the inherent contradictions that exist within a Powys unitary authority. They will also be destructive of local government. That is why I believe that the way to deal with those matters is to strike out clauses 27 and 28, which is what we advocated in Committee and last night.

I was referring to decentralisation when the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery intervened. I recall the attitude of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor in Committee. He said that he supported decentralisation. He did so only because he realised that his attempt to break up—if I can use that expression—the Powys unitary authority into its constituent parts was doomed to failure. He supported the decentralisation measure to prepare for that eventuality. He made that quite clear.

In fairness, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery gave precise expression to those views when we debated the matter in Committee. I understand that, as it was a practical and realistic expression, but it does not fit with the sense of synthetic outrage that we get from the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor, who pretends that all along he has been a vigorous defender of the interests of Brecon, Radnorshire and Montgomeryshire and that he will brook no compromise.

Clauses 27 and 28 stand testament to the attempts of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor to reach a compromise deal with the Government. The whole purpose of the compromise was so that he could sell out on unitary authority status. That is the reason for the latest Government attempt to backtrack on their position, for which they were prepared to go to the wall yesterday, on amendment No. 54. They understand that, by doing so, they will deny the hon. Gentleman even that fig leaf of a decentralised area committee for his proposed unitary authority of Radnorshire. Since the hon. Gentleman seems to be in some discomfort—at least, he is pulling faces and getting very agitated—I shall happily give way to him. We have plenty of time.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I was becoming a little concerned because, in one of our first debates on the subject, the hon. Gentleman promised three times to give way to me but never did. He will recall that in Committee I was prepared to consider area committees, provided that financial autonomy was included. I had a consistent and regular position, but sadly the Secretary of State said yesterday that he was not able to concede that.

Mr. Davies: Every time the hon. Gentleman intervenes in this debate he demonstrates two things: his failure to convince the Government of the merit of his case—if I had been such a failure, I should have been a little more reticent—and the fact that he has no support tonight on the Conservative Benches.

When we debated these matters in Committee, we supported first Montgomeryshire, then Brecon and Radnor. Then, as the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) said, we supported him. We did so because it was a matter of principle and because we believed that those small rural unitary authorities could be viable, especially in the context of a mid-Wales forum.

First, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor denied his reciprocal support to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, thereby denying the very principle that he asked us to endorse. Secondly, and even more destructively of his case, he knowingly denied the opportunity for the creation of a mid-Wales forum. By removing the opportunity of a Meirionnydd that could have joined those unitary authorities, he destroyed that concept of a mid-Wales forum, but that concept provided the alternative that would have allowed the Government to make a concession on the Floor of the House.

I do not know why, but I confess that I share with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery admiration for the forthright position that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor took by voting for a separate Brecon, Radnor and Montgomery. I fail to see why, however, having resigned his position and voted against the Government on those issues, the hon. Gentleman failed to follow the logic of his position and the principle that all Opposition Members had united in defending in Committee. I do not understand why he failed to do so.

What has happened since Committee stage has been significant. First, the Government have accepted the principle of two-tier government—not in Wales, unfortunately, but in England. I share the hope expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that, even at this late stage, the Government will recognise that they have got the thing totally wrong and are in a minority in Wales. I share that hope, but it is a forlorn one. It is worth putting it on record that the Government consider Clackmannan in Scotland, with a population of 47,000, to be worthy of unitary authority status and that Rutland, with a population of 37,000 is also worthy of such status.

I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister say this afternoon that questionnaires are to be sent to every household in Huntingdonshire so that local people can have their say. He said:

"That is the right way to proceed."

That is from the Prime Minister of a Government who insisted yesterday that new clause 11, which would have given precisely the same right to every authority in Wales, must be defeated. Where does the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor stand now? Where do the Secretary of State for Wales and his Front-Bench colleagues stand? Why is it that small authorities can exist in England and Scotland? Why can those in England and Scotland—with the seal of approval from the Prime Minister—have a referendum?

Mr. Alex Carlile: We are a colony.

Mr. Davies: The hon. and learned Gentleman shouts that we are a colony. We are not; we are a proud nation. At the moment, we are suffering from maladministration. The Prime Minister today stated clearly the contempt with which the Conservative party views those of us who live in Wales and who represent Welsh constituencies.

I believe that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor shares that contempt. Having failed to persuade the Government, and having also manifestly failed to organise any support on the Conservative Benches for his case, he is now trying to divert attention from his failures by blaming the Labour party. I do not understand that.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the parliamentary arithmetic is quite simple, but I shall spell it out for the record so that the electors of Brecon and Radnor have a clear understanding of what has happened. The Government have a substantial overall majority. It would require a significant move by Conservative Members, either to join us in the Lobby or to abstain. We need at least 25 Conservative Members and we need to mobilise all Opposition Members to defeat the Government tonight. The hon. Gentleman has made no attempt to mobilise that opinion.

If there was an opportunity, it arose during the debate on new clause 11 last night. The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor seeks to persuade the House and the people of Brecon and Radnor that it is conceivable that all Opposition Members—including more than 260 Labour Members—will come along tonight to endorse a proposition in which the Conservative party has a direct interest. Opposition Members know that the proposition will not restore to our councils—Labour, Liberal Democrat and independent councils—the same rights as the hon. Gentleman demands for Brecon and Radnor. That is all we are asking for. We are not asking to rewrite the statute now; we are just asking for the same rights for our constituencies and districts.

We know how consistent the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor is. We do not have to look in the looking-glass, because we can read the record. When the hon. Gentleman had an opportunity to show consistency of principle, he ratted on it in Committee. He failed to support the case for Meirionnydd, and the cases which we were making for Rhondda, Cynon, Taff, Port Talbot, Neath, and so on. That is a fact.

If there was an opportunity to defeat the Government and to carry the cases for Brecon and Radnor, Montgomery and Meirionnydd, it came last night in the debate on new clause 11. The hon. Gentleman failed not only to mobilise support for it, but failed even to put himself in the Lobby. He is now trying to suggest that we should bail him out. He failed to win the argument, he manifestly failed to win the vote last night and he failed even to persuade the Government of the logic of his case.

I wrote to the Secretary of State last night, saying:

"I recognise that opinion on this matter is divided on both sides of the House and I will be taking the unusual step of proposing that Labour MPs have a free vote on this question. I hope you will be able to adopt a similar position to decide this matter free of any party dogma."

There is a strong case for that, given that we know that there are manifest divisions on both sides of the House.

Local government in all the countries of the United Kingdom is now in turmoil. Why do the Government seek not only to impose different standards on England, Scotland and Wales but to have their ideological writ run wherever they can? I do not understand that, and that is why I wrote to the Secretary of State suggesting that, in the case of Powys where opinion is divided, we should have a free vote. Unfortunately, he has not responded. Presumably, therefore, the Conservative party will be whipped tonight. If the proposal is carried, it will not be because of the absence of Labour Members; it will be because of the Whip which the Government are imposing.

I shall vote tonight against the Government and I shall recommend that my hon. Friends join me in the Lobby. I know that the statements, speeches, actions and attitudes of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor represent nothing more than a gesture. He has been the architect of his own failure.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I totally reject the contemptible approach of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) towards my hon. Friends the Members for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley) and for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). Their contributions to our debates on the subject of local government reorganisation in Wales are just as welcome and constructive as the hon. Gentleman's, and usually more so.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: No, I do not want to give way to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I shall reply to the debate and I am using the same maxim as the hon. and learned Gentleman of not going over the old ground time and time again. We have certainly aired all the arguments very well, and it is now time to come to a conclusion.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) has acted throughout with principle and consistency in continually seeking to advocate what he believed to be the best for his constituents. At the same time, he will accept that the Government have equally acted with principle and consistency in putting forward what we believe is the best arrangement for Brecon and Radnor, and for the rest of Wales.

I believe that it is better because, by proposing a Powys council, we are bringing forward suitable arrangements with a principal authority which is appropriate for mid-Wales. Our proposals for shire committees will make considerable progress in bringing control of local matters to locally elected representatives in the historic counties. That will be a far better arrangement for Breconshire, Radnorshire, Montgomeryshire, Merionethshire and any other part of Wales which seeks to take up the opportunities for shire committees.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose—

Mr. Jones: I do not want to be overlong tonight. Members of the Standing Committee know that I dealt at some length with the possibilities of the shire committees. They are possibilities, and we are not laying down formulas. It is up to local people to decide what they want to make of the decentralisation schemes. I believe that they are better arrangements than what has been advocated. What we are coming forward—

Mr. Alex Carlile: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister said that he would not give way to deal with points that have been already discussed, and of course he is right. Is it in order and appropriate for him to give way on a new point, and is it in order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman is a long-time campaigner in the House and he is very experienced. He knows the answer to that question. The Minister is responsible for his own speech.

Mr. Jones: I am concluding, and I think that the House wants me to make progress and not to waste any more time this evening.

I must say that we will not pursue amendments Nos. 54 and 55. We have listened to what was said yesterday and we have reflected on the matter. We are conscious of the situation of Radnorshire and we believe that there should be an appropriate threshold for numbers of councillors to trigger a decentralisation scheme. We do not look upon the matter as a party political one. It was suggested yesterday that it would need something like 90 per cent. of members elected for one party ticket.

Instead, we are looking for a high level of uniformity from locally elected representatives coming forward on the basis of what they want for their local county. After what we have heard, we are prepared to go back to the original threshold of 10 and therefore we will not be moving the amendments.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 10

COMMUNITY COUNCILS FOR GROUPS OF COMMUNITIES

Amendment made: No. 49, in page 8, line 3, at end insert—

'( ) An order under this section shall make such provision as appears to the council making it to be necessary for the application to the communities included in the group of all or any of the provisions of section 79 of the Charities Act 1993 (parochial charities) and of any of the provisions of this Act with respect to the custody of community documents, so as to preserve the separate rights of each community.'.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Clause 17

GENERAL PROVISION FOR TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS

Amendments made: No. 50, in page 13, line 20, leave out 'to the contrary'.

No. 103, in page 13, line 22, leave out 'express'.

No. 51, in page 13, line 27, leave out 'the appropriate' and insert 'a'.

No. 52, in page 13, line 32, leave out 'the appropriate' and insert 'a'.

No. 53, in page 13, line 34, leave out from 'Where' to 'that', in line 36, and insert

'in relation to any relevant legislative provision, any question arises as to which new principal area is the appropriate new principal area for the purposes of that provision'.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Clause 25

SERVICES

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 19, leave out lines 21 to 45.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 3, in clause 26, page 20, line 23, after '1996', insert 'and

(c) hold public meetings in their areas to discuss the service delivery plans.'.

No. 9, in page 20, line 26, at end insert—

'(3A) A council's service delivery plan shall be published in English and in Welsh.'.

Mr. Murphy: I hope that these amendments will not occupy the House for long.

The three amendments which lie in my and my hon. Friends' names refer to cross-border trading or tendering, to clause 25, which we discussed at some length in Committee, and to service delivery plans. I refer to the arguments that the Government made in Committee. We said then, and we say today, that the Opposition agree with the idea of cross-border trading or tendering. We believe that there is an opportunity for different local authorities in Wales, not only to trade with one another, but to give one another their skills and the expertise that all our local authorities in the Principality have established over many years. In Committee, Ministers said that they would reconsider the operation of clause 25.

Our reservations about the clause were twofold. First, we thought that the geographical restrictions that the Government were to impose on cross-border trading were too restrictive. We said that if it were possible, for example, for the skills in Anglesey to be used by a council in south Wales, that should be a reality. I believe that it was the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who said that he would re-examine those geographical limitations.

The other limitations, which may be more serious, referred to those parts of the clause which, in turn, refer to compulsory competitive tendering. Effectively, those sections say that cross-border trading cannot operate if the services concerned are covered by the Government's regulations regarding compulsory competitive tendering.

There are two problems. The first is that, as recently as this week, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), in reply to a written question, said:

"Compulsory competitive tendering is being extended to six professional support services, in a phased programme—legal services, professional construction and property services, IT, finance, personnel, and corporate and administrative services." —[Official Report, 14 June 1994; Vol. 113, c. 346.]

Some of those are the very services which, we believe, could be offered by one local authority to another.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Is my hon. Friend aware that on 27 April 1994 the very same Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment said at a seminar that he believed that it should be possible for cross-border tendering to take place? I should be interested to hear later whether the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales agrees with that presumption, which has already been put forward by the Department of the Environment at that conference.

8.15 pm

Mr. Murphy: I hope that in reply the Minister will take those facts into account because they seem to be contradictory. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment was right and that cross-border trading could operate in the sectors that I mentioned.

The other aspect of CCT that is affected by clause 25 is that of the areas that are already covered by compulsory competitive tendering. The most significant one is that which refers to the highways functions of our present county councils. The Minister will recall that, in Committee, he and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State jointly announced eight what they called "centres of excellence" in Wales. Those would relate to the highway functions, and they would also have taken over much of the work of highway DLOs in Wales, which are currently run by our county councils. The Government agree—and we agree with the Government—that they are centres of excellence.

The problem is that if those centres of excellence are unable to take part in cross-authority trading and tendering, their viability would be put at serious risk because they would be restricted to the management of trunk roads, motorway networks and only 35 per cent. of the work within the local authority's boundaries. There is some doubt about whether those centres of excellence of highways provision could then apply.

The Government also said that they would consider the Council of Welsh Districts' safeguards, which were outlined in Committee because obviously, as the Minister said in Committee and might say again this evening, they were worried about the risk that would be accepted by the local authorities were they to undertake cross-border trading. I said in Committee—the CWD indicated its support on that issue—that the district auditor, the work of the council through its committee system, and the Secretary of State's powers under sections 13 and 14 of the Local Government Act 1988 are sufficient safeguards to protect, not only local authorities that engage in trading, but other local authorities.

[Mr. Murphy]

I do not think that cross-border trading will harm the viability of our local authorities. It can bring only good to all our authorities in Wales, especially now that they are becoming smaller. We fear that some of the excellent services that are provided, especially by the county councils, should be safeguarded and given to those other local authorities. The last thing that we want is for it to be used as a means simply of privatising more local government services. I do not think that that is under consideration at the moment. What is under consideration is the best delivery of services by the 20-odd—I am not quite sure how many it is now—unitary authorities in Wales.

The purpose of amendment No. 3 is to widen the public debate about service delivery plans. The Government—in our view, rightly—are indicating that those plans should be published. We are saying that those published plans could well be the subject of public meetings. At those meetings, the public who are worried about county council services such as adult education and other matters with which the county deals would be safeguarded by the service delivery plans of the new unitary authorities.

It is also important because the service delivery plans should include the safeguards that the Government intend for the voluntary organisations in Wales. We believe that the Government should give proper guidance to the new transitional committees, and that that guidance should contain recommendations for transitional funding for voluntary organisations in Wales. That has been discussed at length in Committee and I do not want to elaborate today.

Those are our arguments. The Government said that they would return to the Floor of the House to answer the arguments that we and the local authority associations had made to them about CCT.

Mr. Hanson: I do not wish to detain the House for long, but I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will answer a couple of arguments.

I shall not revisit the discussion that we had in Committee. There was an extensive discussion about the Government's original intentions for lead authorities, which were outlined in the White Paper and which indicated the possibility of having centres of excellence within local authorities and thereby allowing some cross-border trading. A centre could be established with a lead authority providing a service which other authorities, such as my own county of Clwyd, could buy in to improve their own local services more efficiently and cost-effectively. As a result of the discussions in Committee, the Government agreed to consult various authorities and agencies in Wales on how best to overcome the matter.

It was obvious from what Lord Rodger of Earlsferry said in another place that the Government intended that cross-border tendering should no longer be part of the fabric of local authority organisation—for reasons, it appeared to the Committee, of pure dogma. I hope that the Committee convinced the Under-Secretary that the Government's objectives for CCT would not be negated by cross-border tendering because everything that could be done under CCT would remain the same and the protections would be in place, but there would be the opportunity to provide what we believe the Government want, which is cost-effective and efficient local services in a number of areas, highways being the one that we discussed most.

I want the Under-Secretary now to tell us the results of the consultation. I understand from a parliamentary reply that letters were sent out on 23 May with replies being sought by 7 June. What response did the hon. Gentleman have from local authorities and organisations on the issue of cross-border tendering? That is relevant to our debate today and I want their responses placed on the record.

The arguments that we advanced in Committee are still valid today. There is no good reason why there should not be cross-border tendering within the new local government structure. The Government have expressed several fears if cross-border tendering is allowed. The first is that the private sector would not be able to take part in certain services in which it is currently involved. That is a fundamentally misconstrued belief. With CCT, anyone who offers a cross-border service, whether from Flintshire, Wrexham or Denbighshire, will do so on the basis that he will win the tender because he has been competitive. Private organisations can still bid for that service and if they are the most cost-effective, the most efficient and in the best interests of the ratepayers, they will win the contract.

Secondly, the Government suggested that the lead authority would place a burden on its own ratepayers. For example, a lead authority such as Flintshire might set up all the infrastructure and expertise in-house to provide a highways service to Denbighshire and Wrexham, but at the end of the day those authorities might decide not to purchase the service. The ratepayers of Flintshire would then suffer a loss. However, local authority organisations have explained to the Government that the district auditor can step in and the Government's powers can be used to stop such a situation dead in its tracks if a local authority provides a service that then begins to lose money. Therefore, the Government's argument is negated.

The arguments for negating cross-border tendering do not hold water. The private sector, which the Government want to compete, can still compete and, if it is efficient, it will win. If, for whatever reason, a local authority finds that it is losing money on a service that it provides, the Government have the power via the district auditor, via councillors who would not wish to be surcharged, or via the Secretary of State's powers to end that service and provide an alternative method of service delivery.

Since the Committee stage, I have discovered that on 27 April the hon. Member for Banbury said at a conference that local government reorganisation would provide fresh opportunities for the delivery of services. He also said—and it is significant for this debate—that there were cases where a council's DSO should be able to deliver services to another council's area or for a joint body of several unitary authorities to provide a service.

I return to the point made often by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies): if the hon. Member for Banbury intends to include in the forthcoming English Bill a facility for local authorities to provide a service, in co-operation with each other, to beat the system of competitive tendering—to allow, perhaps, Rutland to provide a highways service to a neighbouring authority such as Huntingdonshire—why will not the Welsh Under-Secretary do the same for Wales?

I am an Englishman representing a Welsh seat. I received the vote of Welsh constituents, but I was born in England. I am a Member of a British Parliament. I reside in Clwyd. I do not want the residents of Saltney, one mile from Chester, to receive a service that is different from the residents of Chester, which is just over the border. I am acutely aware of the border as it falls in my constituency. If the Department of the Environment allows Cheshire county council to do one thing and the counties of Flintshire and Denbighshire to do another, I shall be angry and upset. There must be a level playing field between the Cheshires and the Clwyds and between England and Wales.

I rest my case. Tonight we want to hear from the Under-Secretary the detailed results of the consultation following the Committee stage. Does he agree with his Government colleague, the hon. Member for Banbury, or is Wales yet again to be the poor relation to England in cost-effective service delivery?

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We have had useful debates on this subject both tonight and in Committee. As we promised in Committee, we have consulted the local authority associations, although I cannot go through all the responses this evening. We believe that the powers for regulation are still needed, but I am sure that the House will welcome the fact that we do not intend to impose any geographic restrictions unless there is clear evidence of authorities abusing their freedom to provide services to authorities throughout Wales.

In the case of services subject to competitive tendering, we see no case for cross-border tendering for work such as refuse collection, building maintenance and catering. We have considered carefully the professional services that will become subject to competitive tendering after reorganisation. We have concluded that personnel, legal and financial services that are already adequately dealt with by even the smallest district council, and where there are many potential private sector suppliers, should not be used for the purposes of clause 25. However, we are still considering the possibility that authorities appointed as my right hon. Friend's agents for trunk road maintenance should be allowed to provide professional highways services to other authorities. In due course, we will consult further on draft regulations and will keep the position under review.

If genuine difficulties emerged, it would always be possible for my right hon. Friend to amend the regulations to provide a more relaxed regime. I cannot commend the Opposition's amendment to the House, principally because it would remove my right hon. Friend's regulation-making power.

On amendment No. 3, the Government believe that it is for the new councils to decide how best to publicise their service delivery plans. The publication of those plans will provide the public with the opportunity to comment on the shadow authority's proposals, and I suspect that shadow authorities will wish to consider whether a public meeting is the best way to subject their plans to public scrutiny. I am happy to consider whether the thrust of the amendment should be included in the guidance, but I am not prepared to limit the discretion of the authorities by including it in the Bill.

Mr. Murphy: There is a mixture of disappointment and agreement here. On the disappointment side, I do not understand for a second why some of the personnel, legal services, information technology and so on, certainly in the more sparsely populated areas of Wales, could not be the subject of cross-border tendering. Nobody would have anything to lose and there would be an awful lot to gain if that were to occur.

8.30 pm

I am, however, grateful that the Minister has agreed to have a further look at the highways provision and I am glad that the Government have agreed that the geographical restrictions should be lifted. It is also important that the possibility of public meetings will be included in the guidance notes to local authorities.

Although I am disappointed, I am grateful for those concessions and to that end I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We now move directly to amendment No. 56, to be moved formally.

Mr. Morgan rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there a problem?

Mr. Morgan: I wanted to speak to amendment No. 59.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think that we have got there yet. We have reached amendment No. 56.

Clause 28

DECENTRALISATION SCHEMES: APPROVAL, IMPLEMENTATION AND SAFEGUARDS

Amendments made: No. 56, in page 22, line 6, leave out 'one year' and insert 'six months'.

No. 57, in page 22, line 11, at end insert—

'( ) Where he proposes not to approve the scheme as submitted, the Secretary of State shall notify the council concerned, before the end of that six month period, of the modifications which he proposes to make to the scheme, or (as the case may be) that he proposes to reject the scheme.

( ) Before he approves a scheme subject to modifications, or rejects a scheme, the Secretary of State shall have regard to any representations which have been made to him by the council concerned.'.

No. 58, in page 22, line 28, leave out from beginning to end of line 12 on page 23.—[Mr. Gwilym Jones.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: We now move to amendment No. 59.

Clause 32

DECISION MAKING PROCEDURES OF PRINCIPAL COUNCILS: EXPERIMENTAL PERIOD.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 25, line 19, leave out from beginning to end of line 17 on page 26.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 60, 110 and 111.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Clauses 32 and 33 were intended to allow the new authorities in Wales the opportunity to experiment with alternative forms of political management within the framework provided by the existing system, but, of course, there was severe criticism of the clauses in Standing Committee and we concluded that further consideration would be beneficial before legislating for changes to a system which appears to be working quite well. Therefore, we have decided that the introduction of a completely new unitary structure with all that that entails in terms of upheaval and reorganisation of services is not the right time to be putting forward the proposals included in clauses 32 and 33, so we decided to remove them.

Mr. Morgan: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I apologise for having misheard you a few seconds ago. I only wanted to speak briefly on the matter.

Obviously I shall not oppose the Government introducing amendments for which we pressed hard in Committee, but it is fair to say that the Minister did not tell the whole story in that brief introduction. We were asking for a spirit of experimentation which would involve some discussion of the benefits to central Government of the merits of those aspects of the historical functions and modus operandi of local government that we were commending. We were asking for the same flexibility to be applied, possibly to the proceedings of the House. As a result of some of the movements in the direction of flexibility in the reform of Prime Minister's questions and other aspects of the Jopling report, we thought that the Government should give serious consideration to measuring the benefits of Opposition Members having access to civil servants who work only for Ministers in central Government, but whose equivalents work for both sides of the political divide, if there is one, in local government.

Had we had equal access to those officials, as we would have done in local government, we might then have been able to uncover some of the mysteries of the functions of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel and its rather strange extensions which appear to have affected or had a side effect on the proceedings of the Bill.

We were concerned with the principle of measuring the effectiveness of Government. If they want experiments, they should apply them not only to local government, but to central Government. In order to have an experiment, we need some measurement technique to decide what we would count as a success or an improvement on the present system.

Many of us have had short, medium or long experience in the House as well as backgrounds in local government either as elected members—in some cases leaders of councils—or, as in my case, as a local government officer and a civil servant before coming to the House. We therefore have some idea of how some of the advantages of the civil service and Cabinet government and some of the advantages of the committee system and shared access to full-time local government officers could be applied to central and local government simultaneously in a properly measurable, audited and independently validated experiment to improve local and central Government.

Some aspects of local government practice would benefit enormously the proceedings of the House and central Government through the Executive, and some aspects of central Government practice could be brought into local government through experimentation procedure, as was the purpose of the two amendments.

We are happy that the Government have listened to us, although they heard only half the message and took the easy way out by scrapping the whole idea without really conceding the principle that both central and local government could do with a great deal of improvement and could learn a great deal from each other.

Obviously, the Government are nervous about learning something from local government and giving Opposition Members equal access to full-time local government officials. As a result, they have taken the coward's way out. Before anybody had too many bright ideas about giving Opposition Members access to Parliamentary Counsel, private offices or full-time civil servants, they decided to scrub the idea of introducing Cabinet government monopoly access to full-time officials for people on the majority side in a party organisation, using the techniques of Cabinet government and having the sole loyalty of the full-time officials until they get thrown out at the next election.

By scrapping the two clauses and the idea of experimentation, the Government have shown that they never thought it through in the first place; nevertheless, I warmly welcome their decision.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sure that my hon. Friend's wonderful recollection of the debate is the accurate one. My own is that my hon. Friend's marvellous mocking humour shamed Ministers and we probably made too good a case against the clauses. I suspect that, as a result, the Minister has given up and given way.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 33

DECISION MAKING PROCEDURES OF NEW PRINCIPAL COUNCILS: PERMANENT PROVISION.

Amendment made: No. 60, in page 26, line 18, leave out from beginning to end of line 42.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

Clause 38

INITIAL TRANSFER OF ASSETS TO COUNCIL FUNDS.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 61, in page 31, line 29, leave out from beginning to end of line 1 on page 32.

I must first thank the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) who helped us reach the conclusion that clause 38 can be deleted. In Standing Committee, he asked whether the assets referred to in subsection (1) could include, for instance, council houses whose finances are dealt with in the housing revenue account and whether, therefore, the clause duplicated the order-making power in clause 54, which provides for the transfer of property rights and liabilities.

The answer to his question was that clause 38 would not operate in that way, but we have looked at the position again and concluded that clause 54 gives my right hon. Friend all the necessary power to transfer assets and clause 38 can therefore be deleted.

Mr. Murphy: I wish simply to place on record the fact that at least four columns of the Committee Hansard were devoted to the Government's defence of clause 38. I am extremely grateful that the Minister has conceded that the clause is unnecessary, but more importantly agreed that my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), as he did in all the proceedings of the Committee, made an outstanding contribution to the success of that Standing Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

REDUNDANCY PAYMENTS

Amendments made: No. 62, in page 34, line 39, leave out from '(1)' to end of line 3 on page 35 and insert

'In determining the effect of any provision of—

(a) Part IV, V or VI of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, or

(b) Chapter II of Part IV of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992,

in relation to a person whose contract of employment is terminated as a result of this Act, it shall be assumed that he was dismissed by the old authority concerned by reason of redundancy immediately before 1st April 1996 and that his dismissal was proposed by the authority.

(1A) For the purposes of this section—

(a) a person's contract of employment is terminated as a result of this Act if—

(i) immediately before 1st April 1996 he was in the service of an old authority under a contract of employment which would have continued in force if that authority had not been abolished; and

(ii) his contract of employment is not transferred to a new principal council or to the Residuary Body; and

(b) a contract of employment is transferred—

(i) to a new principal council, if it is treated by any provision made by this Act, or by or under any other enactment, as continued in force with that council on 1st April 1996; or

(ii) to the Residuary Body, if it is so treated as continued in force with the Residuary Body on that date.'.

No. 63, in page 35, line 5, leave out 'such'.

No. 64, in page 35, line 5, after 'payment' insert

'under Part VI of the Act of 1978'.—[Mr. Gwilym Jones.]

Clause 45

OTHER COMPENSATION PAYMENTS

Amendments made: No. 65, in page 35, line 12, leave out from '(1)' to end of line 16 and insert

'This section applies where any contract of employment made before 1st December 1993 is terminated as a result of this Act.

(1A) Subsection (1A) of section 44 applies for the purposes of this section as it applies for the purposes of that section.'.

No. 66, in page 35, line 39, at end insert—

'( ) The Secretary of State may by regulations exclude the operation of this section in prescribed circumstances (and, in particular, in cases of engagement by new principal councils).'.—[Mr. Gwilym Jones.]

Clause 47

OLD AND NEW PRINCIPAL AREAS WITH THE SAME NAME

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 104, in page 36, line 27, leave out '1' and insert '1(1)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 112.

Mr. Jones: Clause 65(2) provides for certain clauses to come into force on enactment. However, as implementation will take place in 1996, there is no longer the pressing need to have the other provisions of clause 1 amending the 1972 Act immediately following Royal Assent. They can be phased in using the commencement order powers under clause 65.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 50

EXISTING JOINT BOARDS AND COMMITTEES AND PORT HEALTH DISTRICTS

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 67, in page 37, line 38, after 'councils' insert

'in relation to such areas in Wales'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 68 to 70.

Mr. Jones: Clause 50 provides the mechanism for the transfer of property held by existing county councils in Wales and required to be applied in accordance with section 90 of the Welsh Church Act 1914. To avoid the division of a property into 22 funds—one for each council—it is to be vested in the lead authorities. The amendments make minor technical changes to clarify the provisions for apportionment of the funds, which will take effect on 1 April 1996.

Mr. Murphy: The Minister will recall that there was a lively debate in Committee on the 191[illegible]t, and I hope that he will be able to indicate which particular Welsh authorities will be designated lead authorities. We argued in Committee—but not today because the argument was concluded in Committee, if not in our favour—that every local authority should act as those authorities dealing with the Welsh church fund moneys.

My first point is one of definition. Page 38 of the 1914 Act, at line 24, uses a word that my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) asks to be interpreted by the Minister—"eleemosynary". The "Oxford English Dictionary" indicates that it pertains to alms giving. My hon. Friend the Member for Gower points out that one of the Bronte sisters wrote that

"eleemosynary relief never yet tranquillised the working classes."

It seems that operation of the 1914 Act is important to not just the working classes but everybody in the Principality.

The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs conducted an investigation only last year into the preservation of historic buildings and ancient monuments. I remind the Minister that it indicated that the Welsh Office should consider how the funds could be restructured on a more equitable and consistent basis for transferring them to the proposed unitary authorities. The Government replied:

"Each county council"— or leading authority, as it will now be—

"is required to administer its Welsh Church Act fund in accordance with a scheme which sets out the charitable and other purposes to which the Fund's property will be applied. Each scheme has to be approved by the Secretary of State. The Department is not aware of any instance of a council failing to comply with the provision of its scheme but, in the light of the Committee's concerns, it proposes to invite the Charity Commissioners to review the administration of the Funds to see what improvements may be made."

It would be a good idea for the Government to undertake a consultative exercise and to make recommendations to lead authorities as to how best the 1914 Act could be operated in some instances. In some parts of Wales it works extremely well, but in others, not so well. I will be grateful for the Minister's comments.

Mr. Rowlands: I remind the Minister of the role that the Welsh church funds have played in Mid-Glamorgan, in supporting and upholding the fabric of many chapels and churches in our communities and of the rightful necessity for that work to continue. If the Minister is to establish lead authorities, I hope that one of them will be really representative of the valley communities and that the funds' representation will not be centred on Cardiff. I hope that the Minister will now give the assurance that I sought in Committee.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I recognise the aspirations of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and there is considerable merit in his comments. I shall see what we can do to achieve that which he seeks.

As to lead authorities, I remind the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) that I made him happy, but upset my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans), by suggesting that the lead authority for Gwent would probably be Torfaen, on the basis that the computers are currently located there and the administrative arrangements are already to hand. However, our arrangements will ensure that all 22 authorities will fully participate appropriately in the administration of the church funds.

I am advised that the word identified by the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) means the relief of the poor.

As to the point about restructuring, which was raised in the Select Committee report, we referred the matter to the Charity Commissioners. The hon. Member for Torfaen suggested consultation, and there is merit in that. That is something that we should examine, but not in the course of local government reorganisation. I am aware that the Wales Council for Voluntary Action has also made worthwhile suggestions about what might be done with the church funds, but those are all matters that we should consider later.

Schedule 3

Establishment of Principal Councils

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I beg to move amendment No. 85, in page 59, line 8, leave out from beginning to end of line 19 and insert—

'9.—(1) In this paragraph "council" means a county or district council which ceases to exist on 1st April 1996 by virtue of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994.

(1A) No election of councillors of a council shall be held after 31st December 1994, except—

(a) to fill a casual vacancy in the office of councillor of that council where before 31st December 1994—

(i) the office has been declared to be vacant; or

(ii) notice of the vacancy has been given under section 89(1) of this Act; or

(b) where the number of casual vacancies in the office of councillor of a council occurring after 31st December 1994 exceeds half of the total number of such offices.

(2) Any such councillor holding office immediately before 31st December 1994, or elected after that date to fill a casual vacancy, shall, unless he resigns his office or it otherwise becomes vacant, continue to hold office until 1st April 1996.

(2A) It shall not be necessary—

(a) to fill any casual vacancy in the office of councillor of a council occurring after 31st December 1994; and accordingly section 89 of this Act shall have effect with the necessary modifications in relation to any such vacancy; or

(b) to fill any casual vacancy occurring during March 1996 in the office of chairman or vice-chairman of a council.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendments Nos. 86 to 98, 113 and 114.

Mr. Jones: In Committee, I undertook to return at this stage with our proposals for the suspension of elections to casual vacancies. The amendment fulfils that commitment and confirms our preference for 31 December 1994 to be the cut-off date, except for circumstances described in the amendment. It also suspends the district council elections in 1995 and prolongs the mandate of district councillors.

Amendment No. 86 removes the provision relating to the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1941. It is no longer required because the Act has been repealed by the Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1993.

Schedule 13 deals with the powers and administrative arrangements of the residuary body for Wales.

Amendments Nos. 87 to 93 represent minor drafting amendments to provisions that apply for other enactments to the residuary body in order for it to carry out its functions.

Amendments Nos. 94 and 98 are consequential amendments which have been necessitated by the Police and Magistrates' Courts Bill.

Amendment No. 95 is simply a technical amendment to clarify the wording of paragraph 46 of schedule 15, which itself amends section 215 of the Local Government Act 1972. It does not make any substantive change to the provision.

Amendment No. 96 is a technical amendment to paragraph 56 of schedule 15, which itself amends section 255(1) of the 1972 Act to take account of the new local government system.

Amendment No. 97 is a technical amendment to paragraph 17 of schedule 16, which amends section 39(1) of the Land Compensation Act 1961 to provide a reference to county boroughs in the definition of an authority possessing compulsory purchase powers.

Amendment No. 113 amends the Local Government Finance Act 1988 and ensures that an extant local government finance provision will apply to all the new authorities.

Amendment No. 114 is a technical amendment and clarifies an ambiguity arising from the current drafting of paragraph 19(2) of schedule 17.

Mr. Wigley: I am glad of the opportunity to speak about this provision, because, as I see it, quite difficult complications could arise from the fact that after 31 December 1994 no casual vacancies can be filled in an authority that runs until 1996 as an operative authority. That could be the case in rural Wales, for example, where councillors might represent very large areas, but single-member wards, and have difficulty in getting coverage for such wards. It seems unlikely, but if half the councillors resigned, died or whatever, would all the empty wards come up together, or just a number to make it up to over half? The provision seems somewhat artificial, and I cannot see why it would not be possible for it to run through at least until a date in 1995 so that no one is left without representation at a time that is fairly critical to their futures.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) asks an important question, because, obviously, there are single-member wards as well as multi-member wards, and those vacancies could create a vacuum. I hope that the Minister will accept the need to reply on that point, although in general the proposal is at least an improvement on what was offered in Committee—pushing the date forward.

Amendment No. 87 requires a little more comment than that made so far by the Under-Secretary. Most of the other amendments were aligned with other legislation, apart from that relating to by-elections. The amendment edges us one step further down the road of how to define the residuary body. It makes it look as though for some purposes—rather more than the Government have so far revealed—the residuary body will be defined as a non-departmental public body; in other words, it will be a quango. The amendment incorporates the right of the ombudsman to take up complaints against the residuary body. That right did not exist in Committee because of the Government's enthusiasm for trying to prevent the residuary body from being construed, politically or legally —I am not sure which—as a quango.

Obviously, the Secretary of State is anxious about his record. He wants to be known as a "quango buster", having realised that that might increase his popularity rating in Wales from 0 per cent. to 1 per cent., so he does not want to be seen to be creating any more quangos. Nevertheless, he is being pushed in that direction, probably by the advice that he is receiving. If the residuary body is to have the powers of the ombudsman made applicable to it by the amendment, it would probably be better to go the whole hog.

The Secretary of State will appoint the chairman and some of the members of the residuary body. If I recall correctly, the National Audit Office is to have access to its books—presumably, it will be listed in "Public Bodies", which is the bible of the quangos. "Public Bodies" is published and updated every year and gives the salaries of chairmen and members. In Committee, the residuary body was presented as having a curious undefined status, but a panoply of audit and examination powers and its responsibility to the House go with its being a quango. I therefore hope that the Under-Secretary will say that he accepts the case we made in Committee that the residuary body cannot be other than a quango, because there is no other category into which it fits.

The Government accept that case, functionally, through the taking up of complaints of maladministration and by stating in the amendment that the residuary body will be subject to the review powers of the ombudsman. It has been recommended that there should be compensation where maladministration is proved. I hope, therefore, that the Government will come clean and say that they are creating a quango, even if it has only temporary status.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I appreciate what the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said about vacancies, especially in rural areas, but we feel that the cut-off date of the end of the current calendar year is an appropriate time to draw a line. The number of vacancies is not expected to be large, although we have put in that ultimate provision of one half of the vacancies in that most unusual—and I think almost impossible to envisage—circumstance. Recollecting what happened in 1973 and 1974, I think that it will suffice. Of course, the shadow councils will be elected in April or May next year. They begin the work for the following year; in that way, they start subsuming activities. There must be some form of continuity there.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister implying that a councillor who has been elected to the shadow authority will have a right to attend meetings of either district or county authorities?

Mr. Jones: I do not expect councillors to have such a right, but I recall that, in the reorganisation of 1973-74, as a shadow councillor, I was invited to attend meetings of the council that was about to cease to exist. That may happen again. Nor do I expect shadow councillors to have powers under the existing councils, but I anticipate that, from the following year onwards, the shadow council will subsume the activities of the existing one.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) mentioned the residuary body. I did not think that my proposals needed further explanation: these are only minor drafting improvements, which do not affect the substance of the provisions as previously drafted. I hesitate to try to help him by giving a definition of quangos. Following yesterday's sitting of the Welsh Grand Committee, I know that his party is quango-mad—not least because of the number of representatives whom Welsh Labour councils appoint to their own quangos. The hon. Gentleman seems to define whatever he finds as a quango.

Mr. Ron Davies: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, but I must point out that he is treating the time that remains rather carelessly by being unnecessarily provocative.

The Secretary of State was entirely wrong to make the suggestion that he made yesterday. It showed a complete lack of understanding of the way in which local government operates with its representation on other bodies, which cannot possibly be equated with the quango state created by the Government. If the Minister reflects for a moment on the meaning of the acronym "quango", he will understand that he has misread the position.

9 pm

Mr. Jones: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. Local electors, and some councillors, may wish to study further the quango appointments made by Welsh Labour councils. But the last thing that I want to do this evening is to be provocative, certainly towards the hon. Gentleman.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 11

WATER, LAND DRAINAGE AND COAST PROTECTION

Amendment made: No. 86, in page 100, line 14, leave out from beginning to end of line 17.—[Mr. Redwood.]

Schedule 13

THE RESIDUARY BODY FOR WALES: CORFF GWEDDILLIOL CYMRU

Mr. Morgan: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 103, line 29, leave out 'nor more than 7'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 20, in page 103, line 30, after 'by', insert 'the principal councils in consultation with'.

No. 21, in page 103, line 32, leave out 'may by order alter either of the numbers' and insert

'may with the agreement of a majority of the principal councils by order alter the number.'.

Mr. Morgan: Although this is the final group of amendments, I do not feel that we can simply whistle through the provisions to which they refer. They relate to issues that I touched on briefly when discussing Government amendment No. 87, which provided a foretaste of the questions raised by the establishment of the residuary body.

We made certain demands in Committee. This is our first attempt to return to the theme in a big way, and our last opportunity to put right the difficulties encountered by the Government in their attempt to bridge the gap between the definition of quangos as quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations, or non-departmental public bodies which are listed in "Public Bodies"—an annual Government publication—and the definition to which the Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary are trying to extend it. They suggest that a quango is something that they define as a quango; a body created by local government could be a quango as well.

That is an absurd proposition, but it is very relevant to the amendments. Quangos are organisations that are listed in "Public Bodies", the Government's bible, because their chairmen are appointed by the Secretary of State and because various other provisions apply. Certain other bodies probably ought to be listed. Several hundred are included, but it clearly is not complete. Occasionally organisations "drop out", as happened with the Commonwealth Development Corporation, which was removed about two years ago when it was deemed to be a commercial trading organisation.

What about the residuary body for Wales? We do not want that to be a quango in either function or name; we want it to be what the Government want to present it as. They may want to present it as not being a quango, but we want it genuinely not to be one. We do not want it to be completely under the control of the Secretary of State; we do not want the Secretary of State to determine the appointment of its chairman, its membership, its powers or the length of its life, or to be empowered to shrink, maintain or extend its powers.

The Bill gives the Secretary of State Henry VIII powers to extend the residuary body, terminate it and move it sideways, forwards, upwards and downwards. It is undoubtedly his creature. Given the way in which it is currently defined in the Bill, it will certainly be a quango—although the Government do not want it to be recognised as such. Our amendments seek to remove it from any such danger by giving the Secretary of State some powers, but requiring the exercise of those powers to be conjoint with those of the new principal councils.

This is, after all, intended to be the body that will deal with the property of the present quantum of local authorities in Wales, if it is determined—after the passage of the Bill, and by means of various orders and subsidiary legislation—that that property is not to be properly housed among the new authorities. Cardiff-Wales airport is the outstanding example. We are concerned that its future lies with the residuary body.

Mr. Redwood: I hope that the current owners of Cardiff airport will come to an arrangement on its future, which could include private capital and a greater role for its management, which would solve the problem. If they do not, it will pass to the residuary body. I do not intend to split the shareholdings among all the new authorities that could have a claim. It is in the hands of local government, and I hope that it solves the problem.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful, in one sense, to the Secretary of State for his attempt to clarify the matter, although not for the content of his intervention. He is placing a sword of Damocles over local authorities. Democratically elected councillors on unitary bodies, who have spent countless time building and fighting for a financial commitment to Cardiff-Wales airport, are being told, "If you don't sell it, you certainly won't see the benefit of it afterwards." It will be placed under the dead hand of a residuary body which, without amendments Nos. 19, 20 and 21, will be under the control of the Secretary of State.

In the next few months, those councillors will not be able to wait for an appropriate time to undertake the task that the Secretary of State has talked about of bargaining, on a willing buyer, willing seller basis, with private capital through privatisation, a management buy-out or the process that is sometimes known as Prescottisation—an option that the Opposition's employment spokesman adumbrated as an alternative to privatisation before the last general election, whereby private capital is used in transport projects to ensure that they are not restricted by the public sector borrowing requirement.

Such a process cannot be undertaken if it is known that the project must be shovelled off to management within 12 months rather than accepting more appropriate timing, which might be in the interests of the buyer, the investor, if it was taking a minority stake, or the seller—the three democratically elected councils of Mid, West and South Glamorgan. That is unsatisfactory because it puts all the pressure on the three Glamorgans to get shot of the airport now, even though they would receive a better price if the threat of placing it under the control of the residuary body were removed.

If the Government persist in that intention and cannot be dissuaded, we will face the problem of their in effect nationalising Cardiff-Wales airport. The Government are opposed to nationalisation, but that will be the result if the Bill is enacted and the Secretary of State executes his threatened action, because a satisfactory price will not be obtained by the three present owners with a sword of Damocles hanging over them, and control will pass to the residuary body—all of whose members will be provided by the Secretary of State—from the airport's municipal owners.

That would probably be the first nationalisation that the Secretary of State for Wales has undertaken. When he got home that night and told his wife that he had nationalised an airport in Wales, the dog would bite him. We are trying to get him out of that difficulty by asking him not to make the residuary body completely responsible to him for its membership and the power to terminate or extend its life. He should make it clearly a transitional body by means of which powers may be passed from one group of democratically elected councils to another group of democratically elected councils. The transitional bodies should contain a majority of democratically elected councils. That would be the solution and it would enable the Secretary of State to avoid being bitten by his dog when he gets home after inadvertently nationalising Cardiff-Wales airport.

I ask the Secretary of State to give serious consideration to his future state of health, in relation to either his leg or his backside, and accept our amendments to the clauses dealing with the residuary body.

Mr. Rowlands: We cannot just nod through the clauses dealing with the residuary body without trying to discover a little more about the nature of the animal.

Mr. Morgan: The dog.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not know whether it will be of that character, but it will be an interesting animal.

The only precedents that we have for this type of body are the residuary bodies created under previous local government reorganisation in England on the break-up of the metropolitan authorities. I took the opportunity to look at the annual and final reports of a handful of residuary bodies to discover what sort of animal it is likely to be. I shall give the House the benefit of this modest degree of research.

Each of them turned out to be a huge property company. For example, the West Yorkshire organisation took over the powers of West Yorkshire metropolitan council. It took over about 28,000 deeds and 800 sites worth about £20 million, which it sold for £33 million, handing the distribution to the five district councils. At its peak, it employed 219 people, full time and part time.

That is one authority, dismantling one unit of local government and distributing the powers to five others. We are talking about a residuary body that will take over the surplus land of eight county councils and 36 district councils throughout the Principality. It will be one of the largest property companies in Wales. It will have enormous power. It will have the power to levy. However, one hopes that after the experience of the West Yorkshire organisation, the levies will be less than the distributed proceeds. The Secretary of State may nod his head. The reason for the success of the authorities at that time is that they coincided with the big property boom. The years 1986, 1987 and 1988 were a good time to get one's hands on property and then sell it off.

I do not think that the new residuary body will be operating in the same type of market. [Interruption.] I hope that it does not, because it would have a disastrous effect on inflation. I thought that the Government did not want a boom and bust economy. The Secretary of State seems to be backing a boom and bust economy. Is this another division between the Secretary of State and the Chancellor?

We are right to draw attention to the amazing character that the residuary body will have. It will be dealing with sensitive issues. I do not know whether, like the West Yorkshire authority and others, it will handle the pension funds for a time. I assume that it will not. I assume that it will take surplus revenues, as opposed to just surplus land and property, from every one of the existing district and county authorities. It will also have in its possession a large number of sensitive civic buildings that might be surplus to requirements. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) has mentioned one. I am thinking of the Mid Glamorgan county council office. Will that be taken over by a residuary body and sold off? Will we have a Greater London council re-run in the middle of Cathays park?

As I have said, we should not just nod this organisation through. I have a practical suggestion to make to the Secretary of State. I can see the need for an organisation, but I wonder why he needs to create something new.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West has suggested one model that I suspect the Government will refuse. So why not use the Land Authority for Wales as the main body? If it is to be what I suspect, which is a five-year property company, why create a huge new organisation when there is in existence a rather successful and well-organised body? I should not really draw attention to it in case the Secretary of State decides to look at it. It was my creation and I am proud of it. Way back in 1974-75 it survived the abolition of the community land legislation. It has done a very useful job alongside the Welsh Development Agency. Why does not the Secretary of State use the Land Authority for Wales as the main vehicle for carrying out that function, given that, in many cases, it has created sensitive and good working relationships with local government? It will not be a completely new animal. I hope that the Secretary of State will accept the model suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West, but, assuming that the Government do not accept that model, perhaps the Secretary of State would consider the practical solution of using the land authority.

We shall be very interested; we shall watch with great care and scrutinise the new body, which will be an enormous property company, handling large numbers of parcels of land from the four corners of the Principality, at a time when it may not be the easiest thing in the world to sell that land and achieve values such as those obtained by the residuary bodies created under previous legislation.

9.15 pm

What will be the method of redistribution? How are the proceeds to be redistributed? It was not difficult for the property of the West Yorkshire body to be distributed among five district councils. In this case, the residuary body will be acquiring properties from 36 councils and eight counties and distributing them among 21—I cannot remember the exact number—unitary authorities. Will the method of distribution be related to the location of the land and property? Will the proceeds stay in the community, or will there be some form of pooling of the resources and an equalisation of the distribution of proceeds? Those are big and serious issues of public policy and before we nod the body through, we ought to find out a little more about the Government's thinking on it.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We discussed the residuary body fairly extensively in Committee. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) argues that it is a quango, but it has many of the characteristics of a local authority for the simple reason that it has to take over local authority contracts, deeds and so on.

We certainly do not accept that it would be right for the new councils to appoint all the members of the residuary body or for there to be no limit on the number of members, as the amendments suggest, for the following reasons. Of course, the body will at times have to take difficult decisions on competing claims for an asset, for example, or on whether an asset is surplus. If all the members were appointed by councils, it could give rise to conflicts of interest. That is therefore one of our objections to the proposals in the amendments.

The residuary body will have limited functions and, indeed, a limited life. It will advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the transfer of property and the disposal of surplus assets. It would certainly make the body unwieldy if we had rather more than four to seven members, which we think would suffice. Having said that, we do not want the residuary body to be dominated by councillors, as proposed in the amendments. My right hon. Friend is open to suggestions—without commitment, of course—as to the membership. He is quite open to any suggestions from local authority associations or individual councillors, as well as from hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) raised a specific point about the disposal of assets, and especially of proceeds. The proceeds will go to the new local authorities which have taken over from those authorities whose assets have been sold. Therefore, in the hon. Gentleman's words, the proceeds of the assets will stay in the area served by the authority from which the assets have been sold.

Mr. Morgan: The Minister of State said that the residuary body had some of the characteristics of a local authority because it would oversee some local authority contracts, but he omitted to mention that it would have one characteristic which is definitely not shared by local authorities: none of its members will be elected. That is a significant distinction which he chose to slide over rather quickly. Perhaps an authority with no councillors is the ideal Tory authority of the future.

The Minister of State also said, incorrectly, that the residuary body would have a limited life. If he reads the small print, he will find that the Secretary of State can extend or shorten its life as he wishes. The Secretary of State has Henry VIII powers to do as he wishes. He could, for example, decide to wait for a property boom. The Minister implied that it could be wound up neatly and that the danger of putting so many powers in the hands of the Secretary of State was therefore far less significant than it really is. The Secretary of State's powers in respect of the residuary body are almost infinite. We are not happy about the way in which it will operate, despite the olive branch so characteristically offered by the Minister of State.

This may be my last opportunity to pay my respects to the remarkable actuarial parliamentary longevity of the Minister of State, so I do so now. His record for holding the same office without being sacked or promoted is similar to the record length of time it took for the Cardiff Bay Barrage Act 1993 to pass through both Houses of Parliament. He and I share the latter record, so we can both appear in the "Guinness Book of Records". The Minister is known throughout the land for his ability to plough indomitably through his briefs and, if he is retiring shortly, I am sure that he has been offered the life presidency of the Freedom from Dyslexia Association. We look forward to the Minister's return to commercial television, the world from which he came. He would be the ideal host for a game show such as "The Price is Right" in Welsh, but I am sure that he will find suitable cultural pursuits. In any event, we shall miss his contributions enormously.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Sir Wyn Roberts.]

9.23 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile: The process leading to Third Reading began a long time ago, before the beginning of this parliamentary Session. Indeed, it was as long ago as 1992 that we heard from the then Secretary of State that local government in Wales was to be reformed. At that time, all parties shared a common purpose, which was to bring unitary local government to Wales. The then

[Mr. Alex Carlile]

Secretary of State made a declaration which, if not full of eastern promise, was certainly full of western promise. The declaration promised the people of Wales unitary local government based on natural communities. In the event, some natural communities, such as Merthyr Tydfil, Cardiganshire and Pembrokeshire, are to have unitary local government, but others are not.

The history of the Bill will be viewed with interest by Welsh political historians. There are not many serious broken promises in Welsh political history which one can nail and which leave one bemused when one analyses why they were broken. One of the most significant promises that has been broken in Welsh political history is what will be known as the Llanfechain promise: the then Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), promised without equivocation or ambiguity that there would be a unitary Montgomeryshire. We have never had an explanation as to why that promise was broken. We have never been told the history of how the change of mind came about. We have never been given a proper insight into the thought processes of the Welsh Office and its Ministers.

At the last gasp, the Local Government Commission for England—the Government appear to accept this—proposed that Rutlandshire, Huntingdonshire and six other authorities smaller than Montgomeryshire in population should have unitary authority status. That decision is entirely consistent with the Secretary of State's views as declared in a Conservative party conference speech, of which he reminded us yesterday.

Earlier, the Under-Secretary of State was asked why what is good enough for Rutlandshire, Clackmannanshire and Huntingdonshire was not good enough for traditional communities in Wales. He did not give us an answer. I hope that in the last breath of the Bill in this House we shall be given a ministerial answer to that question.

In 1992, I thought that we would see an improvement in local government in Wales based on consensus. I am grateful for the support that Montgomeryshire has received from right hon. and hon. Members in all parties: the two Tory rebels in Committee, the hon. Members for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) and for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley); the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who has equal cause for complaint with myself; and the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who from an early stage made it clear that the Labour party would support unitary status for Montgomeryshire. Despite what was said earlier this evening, the hon. Member for Caerphilly has been entirely consistent in what he has said and done, and he deserves praise for that.

Unfortunately, those of us from Montgomeryshire, including the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy and for Brecon and Radnor, will leave the Bill with a deep sense of disappointment. There was a great opportunity to do what was originally promised, but that promise has been broken, leaving us with a sense of deep frustration. I can only express the fervent hope and expectation that one day in the not too distant future we shall return to this issue and I shall be here to see Montgomeryshire restored as a council.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): Sadly—or perhaps happily, in view of the late hour tonight—I was unable to be a member of the Committee. I had hoped that the Government would listen to all the members of the Committee representing Welsh seats on at least two major issues, the first being of importance to the whole of Wales and the second of great importance to the people of an area in my constituency, Llangollen.

The first issue is the lack of any provision for an all-Wales elected tier of government. The creation of unitary authorities makes almost no sense without a regional tier of government. Only a panoply of quangos of one sort or another can provide the services that need to be provided on a strategic basis. It is hardly surprising that the Government should set their face against any increase in democracy, however, as it is far easier to place stooges on quangos than to win elections in Wales, at any rate for their party.

The other issue that has not been dealt with is the placing of Llangollen in the new Denbighshire authority, against the wishes of its people as expressed in the referendum organised by Glyndwr council, of which Llangollen is a part. To set the record straight, the result of that referendum—without rounding up or down—was, on 68 per cent. of ballot slips returned, 58 per cent. in favour of Wrexham and only 42 per cent. in favour of Denbighshire. I remind the Government that they have been governing—I use the term loosely—for 15 years on much less than that majority, even if one measures the vote as a percentage of the total electorate, which seemed to be the Minister's response in Committee.

The Minister of State put forward another strange argument in Committee when he said:

> "As Llangollen and the other two areas belong to the old Denbighshire area which we are reviving and there is no clear majority against joining the new authority, we should let matters stand."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 21 April 1994; c. 155.]

The Minister was, to say the least, confused with that argument since Wrexham was also part of Denbighshire prior to 1974.

Hiding behind the decisions of the three community councils involved does not hold water either. The biggest —Llangollen town council—is now overwhelmingly in favour of Wrexham, and Llangollen rural district council's decision against was six to three, which is roughly the same proportion as Glyndwr's referendum of all residents. Llantysilio has at least been consistently opposed to Wrexham, although it clearly does not represent the views of those polled throughout Llangollen.

Glyndwr has also had a chequered history on the subject, voting only on the casting vote of the chairman to opt for Denbighshire and ignoring its referendum. The chief executive, Mr. Julian Parry, who now writes criticising my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) for some extremely minor errors of little consequence in Committee, and is militant in his ignorance of the referendum result, advised Glyndwr council as follows at its policy and finance committee on 23 June 1992:

> "Being south of the Llantysilio mountains/Horseshoe Pass, there is little community affinity or interaction between this area and north Glyndwr, local communities look to Wrexham as their main centre for most goods, services and employment, the existing pattern of communications and the geography/topography being important relevant factors. The 3 > town/community councils would prefer to remain part of a rural unitary authority rather than joining the new Wrexham unit. Whilst respecting this expressed preference, application of the relevant criteria results in your Sub-Committee recommending that this area has decidedly stronger relationships with Wrexham than with West Clwyd."

I could not have put it better myself and I wonder how Mr. Parry thinks that things have changed in the interim.

The people of Llangollen feel let down: they have voted and nothing has happened. Now we hear that the local government boundary commission for England is to mount an in-depth consultation with English residents over its review. Surely the same could be done for Wales. In any event, I hope that the anomaly of Llangollen can at least be put right, or the people of Llangollen will once again feel let down by this Government. Judging by the European election results in Wales, they feel let down in every other respect as well.

9.32 pm

Mr. Rowlands: I hope that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) will not mind—we have shared their hurt and disappointment in Committee and on Report—if I say that at least the Bill is better in one respect than the Bill that started out. It is a better Bill in respect of schedule 1, part II, page 53 where, under the title "County Boroughs", the "district of Merthyr Tydfil" is listed. It would be wrong not to recognise the significance and importance of that change.

I first came to the House in 1966. As a young, green and inexperienced Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in 1969, I wandered into the terrible world of local government reorganisation, when we attempted to introduce a unitary authority and found that we offended almost everyone on our own side, let alone the then Conservative Opposition Members. We therefore had to be man enough and sufficiently principled politicians to withdraw those proposals in 1969-70.

I was out of Parliament for a brief time, but returned at the tail end of a local government reorganisation measure to see the proud county borough status of Merthyr Tydfil removed by a Conservative Government with the Local Government Act 1972. It is a privilege to be still here 22 years later to get to my feet on Third Reading of the present Bill and talk about the restoration of the county borough of Merthyr Tydfil.

I must break it ever so gently to the Secretary of State that I suspect that he will not get too much of the electoral credit in Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney for the change. On the basis of the enormous achievement of Glenys Kinnock in the European elections—which I am sure will be repeated in the national elections—I doubt whether the Secretary of State will reap too much electoral benefit from the change. Nevertheless, it would be churlish not to say that we were glad that he was a listening Secretary of State, at least in this respect. He has created a county borough which I believe will take the full opportunity of being a unitary authority and will regenerate and redevelop a community in a manner which I hope will be as colourful as in the past. Therefore, I can at least welcome that part of the Bill which recognised the spirit and character of the county borough of Merthyr Tydfil.

9.37 pm

Mr. Llwyd: First, may I echo the words of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands)? I know that it was a great deal of hard work by the hon. Gentleman which brought about the change of heart by the Government, and I congratulate him on his success. I wish that that could also have been the case for the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and for myself, but it was not to be.

I also add my voice to that of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) in congratulating the Minister of State on his service to the House in his present capacity. I am sure that we will all join in congratulating him if it is true that this evening is his final evening at the Dispatch Box.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I thank the hon. Gentleman, and of course I relish the remarks of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West. Were not it for the matter of time and of delaying the House, I would have risen to respond to the hon. Gentleman. I must tell hon. Members that I have made no statement whatsoever about any impending retirement.

Mr. Llwyd: I do not wish to be niggardly, but I was going to couple that with a few remarks. I was going to say that, during his happy days of retirement—thinking of poetry and poets and possibly sitting on a river bank, fishing—the Minister might recall several questions which I put to him during discussions on the Bill which he has not yet answered.

On a serious note, the first flaw which my party sees in the Bill, as was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), is that there is no strategic all-Wales tier of government. My party makes no pretence. It wishes to see a fully fledged Parliament in Wales with tax-raising and legislative powers. But even in the terms of the amendment which was the subject of the debate, it would have been a great step forward. It would have halted the proliferation of quangos in Wales and would have given accountability in a true sense.

It is a matter of some regret that the amendment was not carried in Committee or on Report, but it was the initial response of my party and it remains our main response. There should have been an all-Wales, truly democratic tier responsible for strategic matters in Wales.

There are numerous questions that have not been answered which I believe should have been. I am afraid that there are many flaws in the Bill. One that comes to mind is the absence of strategic planning, about which numerous bodies of professional and expert opinion are concerned. But I shall not go over the same old ground, as we have debated that matter this evening.

A further flaw may be the lack of cohesion, on unitary development plans, among unitary councils. Area committees may be a poisoned chalice—we do not know, and we are quite unsure about many matters to do with them.

I must say, with the greatest respect to the Minister, that earlier today I put to him five specific points about redundancy, TUPE and transfer generally. I have not had one reply. I regret that bitterly because at least one of those matters was put to me by council advisers in Wales. It was of the utmost importance that those matters should have received a reply and I deeply regret the fact that they have not.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I had a great deal of ground to cover, but I was under the impression that I had given at least a framework of an answer to the points which the hon. Gentleman raised. I shall, however, look carefully at what I said and, if points are still outstanding, I shall write to him.

Mr. Llwyd: I am grateful to the Minister. It may assist him to know that those points were raised towards the beginning of my speech. I am not trying to score points. I sincerely asked for answers and should be grateful for them in due course. Many thousands of people in Wales are extremely concerned about the position.

I still have misgivings about voluntary organisations, which have lobbied hard and are concerned about their futures under the present set-up. I moved an amendment in Committee to deal with that point and I am far from assured that their futures are guaranteed in any shape or form. Likewise, many people have contacted hon. Members on both sides of the House about support for the arts. There is little comfort for them, either.

Earlier today, I mentioned the role of community councils. I was reassured in part by the Under-Secretary of State and I sincerely hope that, in due course, the guidance to unitary authorities will include specific provision on the matters incorporated in an earlier amendment.

I feel extremely sad this evening at the loss of Meirionnydd, where seven centuries of government have gone by the board. The same applies to Montgomery, with which we are good neighbours. Both are proud communities which respect their traditions and have a great deal of cultural integrity. I am sure that they will be grossly disappointed at what has been transacted this evening.

I have said before and shall say briefly again that the Bill does not have the consensus of the Welsh people. In those circumstances, it must be wrong. To be workable, it must have the consensus of the people of Wales. After all, it is designed to deliver services to them. It does not have that consensus for many reasons, some of which I mentioned earlier. The Bill is flawed and I echo the words of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery: I honestly believe that we shall shortly be back here discussing local government again.

I conclude with a point of particular concern to me—the maxim, "Tra mor tra Meirion", which will doubtless be referred to again. We in Meirionnydd have stood the test of time and I shall stand up in this Parliament or, I hope, one nearer home, and look at the matter anew in the not too distant future. The people of Meirionnydd will not allow 700 years of their proud history to be done away with at the whim of a Conservative Government.

9.43 pm

Mr. Ron Davies: You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be interested in my first point. The Minister of State has vigorously denied the comment in this morning's Western Mail prophesying his retirement. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) has penned a word for him, which the Minister of State, even if no one else on the Government Bench, will appreciate:

> "Mae Wyn wedi mynd ond ddim wedi trigo; dim ffws, dim ffwdan, heb ddagrau, heb ei gof."

It means, "For the very good of the Minister; the Minister is going, no fuss, no fuss."

If the Minister is to retire, we shall miss him for his personal qualities and his decisive approach in Committee. There were many occasions in Committee when he was having difficulty discussing the arguments that we made to him and he invariably started his remarks by saying, "Well, I should think", or "Well, I would imagine". He had a couple of variations. He sometimes used to say, "Well, off the top of my head", or, "I will consider that point and reply in a moment." He never did reply, of course. There was one marvellous moment when we were debating what has become known as the "Powys pudding". When he was referring to the Government scheme for area committees, he said, "Those are the areas that we want to pacify." He was referring to those five districts of mid-Wales.

I take the opportunity to thank my Front-Bench colleagues, my hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and for Tor hyphen faen, as it has now become known as a result of the passage of the Bill. I also thank my Back-Bench colleagues, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) who, at an early stage in the proceedings, managed to achieve a richly deserved prize as a result of the diligent campaign that he waged on behalf of his town of Merthyr Tydfil. We all appreciate that he was not exactly striving for his political life. He has something in the order of a 30,000 majority and, dare I say it, even if he had lost the battle he would still have won his seat, although with a perhaps slightly reduced majority, at the next general election.

We are on Third Reading. It is the end of the Commons stage of the Bill. There is only one conclusion that I can reach, however: it is an unacceptable Bill. It has been passed by what I consider to be a completely unsatisfactory Commons procedure and it has been piloted—if that does not give rise to a contradiction in terms—by Ministers of whom the best that I can say is that they were wise enough not to stray too far from their civil service briefs.

The central criticism of the Bill is that it did not create a Welsh assembly and our own tier of government. That, I believe, must be the starting point of reform of Welsh government.

The Bill was not based on any principle. There was no meaningful consultation with the people of Wales or with Welsh local government. The Bill certainly did not build on natural communities, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said. The local authority structures, the boundaries and numbers, were arbitrary, taken out of the air, changed from week to week, from year to year. Councils expressed the clearest outrage against the Bill, although the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State managed to say, "I am right when I say that we have received few objections to our proposals for Rhondda-Cynon-Taff". All that I can say is that he could not have listened to what we were saying. There was absolute outrage in those communities, yet the Minister has ignored them. There has been, as late as last night, a complete rejection of our new clause 11, which would have restored some element of democracy to local government reform.

The Bill is a shambles. It took years in preparation, with all the consultation, yet amendments have fluttered down on it like confetti. There were dozens of amendments in the Lords and what seemed like hundreds of Government amendments in Committee. We have had dozens of amendments on Report; whole clauses have been put into the Bill in the past 24 hours; whole clauses have been taken out of the Bill, almost at random. We have had tonight a massive change in the Government's policy on area committees, reducing by 50 per cent. the threshold that was necessary. Whatever else it does, it does not show that this is a thought-out piece of legislation, designed to improve government in Wales.

At the end, there are enormous areas of uncertainty. Area committees and staff transfer are unclear. There is an enormous centralisation of power in the Welsh Office—44 new powers are conveyed to the Secretary of State. We have a new super-quango in the residuary body. The Bill is not for local government; it undermines local government and it has enormous implications for service delivery. It was opposed by 32 of 36 Welsh Members of Parliament.

I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery for his words of thanks to myself and my colleagues. If it has done one thing—and the Government should take note of this—the Bill has ensured that Members of Parliament representing Wales have started to identify a common enemy. We, I think, have learnt that we have a common interest, and a common interest that is not shared by the Conservative party. I hope that that kernel of trust and common working will bear greater fruit in the years to come.

The Bill has been carried on the basis of English Members of Parliament, and of Standing Order No. 86. It was a packed Committee, but the only meaningful change it made has been reversed on the Floor of the House tonight. What price democracy?

The Bill will be costly and it will cause great uncertainty. When it is enacted, all Opposition Members must ensure that it becomes the starting point of a process of reform of Welsh local government, not the end. We will need a new settlement for local government. We will also need a new contract between local government and central Government, which must be based on removing the shackles on local government, of restoring its independence, of recognising the plurality that exists in our public institutions and of understanding that local government exists both to represent the people of its areas and to improve the quality of life.

Above all, we must restore those things that are lacking in Welsh public life—openness and honesty. There must be confidence in the view that there can be democratic control of public affairs and that people can be trusted to run not only their own councils but their own country.

9.50 pm

Mr. Redwood: I thank all those who have contributed to the making of the Bill—hon. Members, local councillors and their officers, organisations and individual members of the public. A great deal of attention has been paid to the Bill and it is the better for that. Special thanks go to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for piloting the Bill through long hours of debate in Committee.

Local government should be government for local people by local people. The crucial decisions will be taken by the new shadow authorities that will be elected next May. Many of the points that Opposition Members wanted clarified are matters that should be decided by local people and we are giving them those decision-making powers. I believe that they have every chance of doing a good job.

The success of the venture rests on councillors and officers, old and new. I have concluded that the elections should be on 4 May 1995, the usual first Thursday in May for local elections and the day on which, in other circumstances, elections to the existing authorities would have taken place. I believe that that will be welcomed by the political parties in Wales, which I have consulted on the issue.

The new authorities will need to recruit their chief officers as soon as possible to plan for the future. They will also need to establish small planning teams to prepare the new authorities' budgets and draw up their service delivery plans. Those people can be seconded from existing local authorities, which will no longer have the same need to plan for the future. Their service plans will set out what the authorities will do.

In this evening's debate we have seen again just how short of ideas and confidence in its own views the Labour party in Wales has become. Today's decision of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) to nominate the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and then to vote for the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for the leadership of the Labour party—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman's latter remarks have to do with Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Redwood: Those remarks are extremely important because it was a foolish decision by the hon. Member for Caerphilly. It means that the policies that he has been advancing may be ditched by the new leader. It certainly means that the person whose job is on the line at the moment is the hon. Gentleman. He backed two horses in a three-horse race and hoped that the two horses would not notice that he had backed each of them. What will he say to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) when he next meets her—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When I last intervened, I meant what I said. Will the right hon. Gentleman now get back to Third Reading of the Bill?

Mr. Redwood: I shall try to ensure that I meet your wishes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Labour party's proposals have centred round the creation of an unnecessary tier of government in Wales —the assembly. Throughout our debates Labour Members have failed to come clean on whether they support their friends in the counties who want fewer, larger strategic unitary authorities, or their friends in the districts who want more, smaller unitaries. The hon. Member for Caerphilly never managed to assert his discipline over his own party around a single clear proposal for local government in Wales. Labour Members have attacked the Government's proposals from a whole range of contradictory directions in an attempt to conceal the absence of any thought-through alternative. They have the audacity to say in the House that they dislike centralising powers and duties in the Welsh Office, when time and again in Committee and on the Floor of the House they have demanded that I take more centralising powers and give greater clarity over things which local government should decide for itself.

Tonight we have seen a Labour party that could not even deliver a vote on the main boundary issue that was fiercely debated in Committee; a Labour party that could not keep its troops here for this Welsh business; a Labour party that has clearly decided that Wales does not matter or can be taken for granted. The vote on Powys shows that not even all the Welsh Labour Members stayed for that critical debate and Labour's total vote fell below the number of Welsh Labour Members of Parliament. What a disgrace when we are told that this is a critical piece of legislation and one that the Labour party should have modified or removed from the statute book. The Labour party has failed tonight in a big way.

We shall carry our Bill. It is good legislation for Wales and it will produce much better local government for Wales. The Opposition are there in tatters behind the hon. Member for Caerphilly, but perhaps not for much longer because he has failed to deliver the vote and failed to deliver the goods and he has no idea how he would like local government in Wales to be conducted.

We have a vision, a view of better local government in Wales. I commend it to the House.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees),

INTRA-COMMUNITY TRADE IN BOVINE ANIMALS AND SWINE

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4168/94, and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 6th May, relating to intra-community trade in bovine animals and swine; and supports the Government's objective of ensuring that the rules protect the health status of the United Kingdom, and the Community as a whole, and sustain the United Kingdom's existing export market.

1992 BUDGET DISCHARGE AND FRAUD IN THE COMMUNITY

That this House takes note of the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by HM Treasury on 16th March 1994, relating to the discharge of the general budget of the European Communities for the financial year 1992 and of European Community Documents Nos. 6214/94, the Commission's report on the fight against fraud in the Community in 1993, and 6214/94 ADDI, the Commission's report on its anti-fraud strategy and work programme for 1994; and strongly supports the Government's policy of securing sound financial management in the Community, including combating fraud against the Community's financial interests.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Question agreed to.

Church of England (General Synod) (Measures)

10.7 pm

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby)(Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners): I beg to move,

> That the Care of Cathedrals (Supplementary Provisions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

It may be recalled that when I moved a similar motion in 1990 in connection with the Care of Cathedrals Measure, I gave an undertaking to the House that a supplementary Measure would be brought before Parliament containing enforcement provisions relating to the procedures for the approval of works to cathedrals.

Both the Government and the national amenity societies were of the opinion that there should be statutory provisions preventing unauthorised works to a cathedral fabric, or, where such works had occurred, provisions requiring the fabric to be made good or reinstated without delay. The Care of Churches and Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure, which the House approved in 1991, contained enforcement provisions in respect of parish churches. Undertakings were given that similar provisions would be included in a supplementary Measure for cathedrals. The Measure before the House tonight honours that undertaking.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman so early in his speech, but I have a specific question that he may be able to answer. Can he tell us whether churches that are neither parish churches nor cathedrals are covered in either this or the previous legislation? Bath abbey, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), is one such church, but there are others—important national churches. As far as I can see, they are not covered in the Measure, but they obviously need to be covered in legislation of some sort.

Mr. Alison: This may be a very short debate. If I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the relevant information at the end, I shall in any case ensure that he receives it.

As I was saying, the Measure honours the undertaking that I gave the House in 1991. It builds on the so-called visitatorial powers of the diocesan bishop which already exist in relation to his cathedral. The cathedral church is, of course, the seat of the relevant bishop. The Measure also includes a power for the court of the vicar-general of the province to issue injunctions or make restoration orders.

The enforcement provisions feature a two-stage procedure. First, the bishop will seek to remedy any apparent contravention of the Care of Cathedrals Measure 1990 by private interview and, if he considers it appropriate, take action through a special visitation. Only if those procedures are unsuccessful will proceedings be instituted for the issuing of an injunction or the making of a restoration order in the court of the vicar-general of the province.

There has been further consultation with deans and provosts, and with cathedral administrative bodies, concerning the Measure. The general view was that enforcement provisions should be provided for, although the cathedral authorities do not believe that they would themselves be likely knowingly to contravene the provisions of the 1990 Measure. The Department of National Heritage, English Heritage and the Cathedrals Fabric Commission for England have also been consulted about the provisions, and are content with them. The Government have continued to attach importance to the legislation, and have taken an active role in pursuing the proposals. I am particularly glad of the supporting presence of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage to receive my appreciation and commendation of the interest that his Department has taken in the report.

Hon. Members will not be surprised to learn, in these contentious days for the Church of England, that there are some financial considerations to be taken into account. There has been consultation with the Church Commissioners and the central board of finance of the Church of England about the financial implications of the Measure.

The Church Commissioners' involvement arises because they have a general responsibility in respect of the expenses of bishops, including legal expenses. Under section 4 of the Measure, where legal proceedings are to be instituted against a cathedral authority the bishop must first inform the Commissioners, who will decide whether they would be prepared to meet some or all of the bishops' costs and expenses in respect of those proceedings. The provision builds on the statutory discretion that the commissioners already have in deciding whether to contribute to a bishop's costs in court proceedings under the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963. The commissioners and the central board are content with the proposed arrangements.

The Measure was given general approval in November 1992, and then went to a revision committee of the General Synod, which made a number of amendments. Final approval took place at the November 1993 group of sessions of the Synod, where the Measure was approved in all three Houses with only one vote against. As will be seen from the report of our own in-house Ecclesiastical Committee, that Committee is of the opinion that the Measure is expedient.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The House is indebted to the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), who presented the Measure clearly and persuasively explained its nature. I do not think that any hon. Member will find it objectionable.

In this debate, we miss our former colleague, the late Bob Cryer, who, while not a church man, took a sensitive interest in church buildings and would have taken part in the debate if only to point out, as was his wont, that there are buildings of fine quality that are not part of the established Church. Nevertheless, he would have welcomed the Measure as it helps to maintain our generation's commitment to maintain that part of our heritage and to remedy the inadequacies of the previous arrangement and as it reflects the overwhelming, if not unanimous, view of the Ecclesiastical Committee, which deemed it to be expedient.

We are debating the Anglican cathedrals of England. The Measure should be passed to maintain the fabric of the Church and to prevent unauthorised and distasteful developments. Without the Measure, in these days when market philosophies are all, it perhaps would be only a matter of time before someone equipped an Anglican cathedral with neon lights and sought to attract the attention of those who devote money to current fads, even if they are distasteful.

Prudence requires that a sensible, historically appropriate approach be taken to these buildings, which are not only important to the Church; some of our cathedrals are among the greatest buildings on the planet and our generation must understand that it has an obligation to maintain them.

Some cathedrals are of ancient origin and owe their construction to those who wished to express their religious beliefs and to worship and to offer gifts to God. The glories of our cathedrals were created by ordinary people, the skilled craftsmen of the day who toiled hard with few labour-saving devices to assist them. One would like to think that their motivation was not simply to practise the skills of their craft. They created buildings of enormous merit and the House should assist the Church to ensure their future.

Many of our cathedrals have stood for almost a millennium and deserve to stand throughout the next one. The House is right, therefore, to ensure that wise legislation is passed because the Church has much to do to serve the present as well as to maintain the glories of the past. I should like to think that the House will have sympathy with the Church in ensuring that its priorities are to those who work for it and who seek to represent its ideals in a society that is becoming increasingly pagan.

Cathedrals allow us to enjoy a little regional pride. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) is in his place. As a Yorkshire Member—I hope that, as another Yorkshire Member, the right hon. Member for Selby will agree—I believe that York is infinitely superior to Canterbury. It would be invidious, however, to mention York without mentioning Salisbury. If one mentions Salisbury, one must mention Durham and the cathedral at Lincoln, which has enormous architectural and historic significance. One could give other examples. All are important and enormously advantageous in providing an inspiration for our country, and we have an obligation not merely to serve the past but to maintain this vital part of our architectural, historic and religious inheritance.

In order to serve that heritage I hope that the House will approve the Measure. I hope that the reasons advanced by the right hon. Member for Selby were sufficiently persuasive to convince the House that the Measure is right and thus justify the decision of the Ecclesiastical Committee that it be deemed expedient.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I, too, found the contribution of my neighbour, the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), to be a clear exposition of the need for this Measure. Although I know that it is not his debate, I am pleased to see in his place the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage. If he chooses to make a contribution to the debate, I hope that he will respond to my concern about the cathedral repair grant scheme which, to a large extent, this Measure is there to regulate and enforce.

Perhaps uncharacteristically from the Opposition Benches, I should like to congratulate the Government on introducing the cathedral repair grant scheme a little over three years ago. I have consulted the Very Reverend John Southgate, the Dean of York, who until recently was the chairman of the Association of English Cathedrals, about how the repair grant has worked in practice. He has nothing but praise for the scheme. He said that English Heritage has handled it with care. As chairman of the committee, he has not received a single complaint and he pays special tribute to Jenny Page and Richard Halsey from English Heritage who have administered the scheme.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) said, our cathedrals are important as places of worship and as centres of excellence in music. Some of them are still important as centres of scholarship and learning. The library at York Minster is now the biggest privately owned theological library and the dean and chapter spend a great deal of money each year ensuring that the stock of books is replenished.

Along with parish churches, historic cathedrals are a unique part of our national heritage. They are large buildings of great age which are still in use today for the same purpose for which they were originally built. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth said, they are monuments to English craftsmanship through the ages. It is for those reasons—both Christian and secular—that they attract so much love and affection from the people of our country. York Minster attracts 2.25 million visitors a year. That is more than the Tower of London and considerably more than the Tate gallery.

Until three years ago when the repair grant scheme was introduced, the cathedrals were unique in another respect. They were the only great historic buildings that were not able to apply for grants for their repair, restoration and conservation. Perhaps I should declare an interest as York Minster is a grateful recipient of money from the scheme. This year it received just under £250,000 for work on the north-west tower. The grant does not replace local fund-raising, but it is an important supplement to it.

The contribution made by English Heritage to York Minster is towards a £3.5 million scheme of restoration for the south-west and north-west towers and the south face of the Minster. That restoration work will take seven to eight years to complete. There is the rub. The restoration will continue for many years to come, but the cathedral repair grant scheme is due to end at the end of next year, after it has run for five years. I am not making a special case for York Minster, because its applications should be judged against the needs of other cathedrals. Nor am I asking for increased annual spending on repair, restoration and conservation of cathedrals.

English Heritage is carrying out a needs assessment to assess the likely future repair costs faced by our great cathedrals. It will make a judgment on whether the current level of funding is appropriate or not and I am happy to leave that decision in its hands and to consider it when its report is published. However, I am asking for cathedrals to be treated in a similar way—not better and not worse—to secular buildings and parish churches. That means that the repair grant scheme must continue beyond the end of the next financial year because schemes to assist the conservation and repair of other secular buildings and parish churches will continue after that time.

One of the great benefits of the scheme has been that those responsible for the fabric of cathedrals have started to plan their repair and restoration programmes ahead, instead of waiting for a crisis, such as the foundations to give way or the roof to cave in, to respond. That important forward planning could and would be lost if the repair grant scheme was to come to an end. I shall give briefly a couple of examples.

At St. Albans, a grant was given for the repair of the central tower. When they started the work, they found that the need for repair and the cost of the scheme was much greater than had originally been estimated. English Heritage was able to help by transferring a grant, which was scheduled for a future year for repairs to the nave, to finish off the repairs to the central tower. That ability to roll funding forward from one year to another will be lost if the repair grant scheme comes to an end. What would have happened if the work on the tower had been commenced next year, in the last year of the scheme? The scaffolding would have been up, the work would have commenced, the bills would have been rolling in and there would not have been a scheme to which to apply in future years.

Ripon, too, faced a similar hiatus when a contractor who was due to come on site suddenly let it down. Since the scheme had not reached its final year, English Heritage was able to roll the funding forward. The same happened at Salisbury when a new architect was appointed.

I am happy to congratulate the Government on introducing the scheme. It is a good scheme and it has worked well, but the question I put to Minister is, will the good work continue? If he speaks tonight, can he give an assurance to the House that the cathedral repair grant scheme will be rolled forward at least for a further five years?

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Like other hon. Members who have spoken, I welcome the Measure. It would be churlish not to, since, as the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) rightly said, it had only one opponent when it went through the Synod. Incidentally, we have not been given the reason why the one person opposed it, but that certainly meant that it was a far less controversial Measure at all stages than many other things which go through the Synod. I note in passing that, today, there was another close vote in the Anglican Church, although not in England. The Church of Scotland voted to agree to women being ordained as priests, which is a decision that I welcome. It has followed the English example, which is, in this case, a better example than that of the Welsh, although the Welsh normally set very good examples.

I have three comments to make and they are made generally, although, of course, my interest is in Southwark cathedral; a beautiful cathedral and the cathedral for the south bank of our capital city. My hon. Friends, including my hon. Friends the Members for Truro (Mr. Taylor) and for Bath (Mr. Foster), have expressed their interest, too. I believe that the question that I posed earlier related to Bath, but there are certainly other buildings, such as Westminster abbey, which are neither one thing nor the other; neither parish churches nor cathedrals, which I assume are covered. That is why I raised the point with the right hon. Gentleman. However, it would be good to hear that, after the Measure is approved, Anglican church buildings are covered, which was its purpose.

I pay tribute to all those who do so such an excellent job in looking after our inheritance, which is what the cathedrals of England are. They are this country's great treasures, and some people give their lives to looking after them. I also pay a specific and timely tribute. My diocese is about to acknowledge the retirement of the Very Reverend David Edwards, who was at Westminster abbey and has had a distinguished career outside and in the House.

David Edwards retires formally at the end of August, but a farewell service is being held next week. Many people in this place remember with affection his time here. He has made great contributions to the Church of England, academically and in his writings as a historian, and in his last post he looked after a beautiful building and made it a vibrant centre for the church and non-church community. People certainly value cathedrals for their beauty and the tranquillity that they offer, but also because they play a role in the wider community.

I wish simply to put on record a second point, but it may elicit an answer. It appears that the Measure provides powers to deal with cathedral administrations that fail to look after their buildings properly. That is a good thing, but my concern is that sometimes it is not, technically speaking, the fabric of the buildings which, for understandable but mistaken motives, administrations may decide to treat wrongly.

I come from Hereford. One of the most controversial incidents for the Church of England and its cathedrals in the past decade was when the dean and chapter of Hereford cathedral decided to sell Mappa Mundi. Technically, it is not part of the fabric of the cathedral, but it is a Hereford cathedral creature. It was made in Hereford and was intended to be in Hereford since the 13th century. It would have been sold had there not been an outcry, and a building is now being constructed in Hereford to accommodate it properly. We have a duty to ensure that the fabric of our cathedrals is looked after by a policing management, but those of us who are equally concerned about the treasures in the cathedrals must find a mechanism to ensure that there is no danger of our suffering from the mistaken short-termism that drove the dean and chapter of Hereford to make a wrong but understandable decision. The national outcry proved how wrong that decision was.

I echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. Members for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) and for York (Mr. Bayley) about the beautiful cathedrals in Yorkshire. I am grateful that the Minister and his Department have become increasingly sensitive to the notion that it is vital for the state to take its share of responsibility for cathedrals. If it does not, we risk being unbiblical. We risk charging people to enter our cathedrals. In many places, that step is now unacceptably close.

It appears to be assumed that anyone going into a cathedral does so as a tourist and should therefore pay. Of course, the upkeep of cathedrals costs a great deal, and members of the church worldwide may feel an obligation to contribute if they can. However, increasingly the impression is being given that a person entering a cathedral has an obligation to spend money. That is entirely unacceptable, and I hope that the tendency will be resisted.

It is also unacceptable when the commercialism of cathedral merchandising operations trespasses increasingly on our worship and fails to remain well and truly outside the building. I seem to remember that Jesus had very clear views about money-changing in the temple. We are not far from that in many of our cathedrals and cathedral premises now. I have made that view known with regard to my own cathedral, where I think the buying and selling should be done further away from the centre of the building, and not simply in the side aisle.

My point is that if the fabric and maintenance of cathedrals are funded properly, the pressure to be commercial can be resisted. If there is no security of funding, they are often driven, because of the need to maintain the fabric and contents, to do things that I think are increasingly inconsistent with their role as mother churches of the diocese for all the people—native and visitors—of the churches of England. I hope, therefore, that the Church will be continually vigilant and the state regularly generous, and that as a result we can have security for our buildings so that they can continue to serve the purpose for which they were so beautifully built.

Mr. Alison: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. I am grateful for the constructive and warm welcome which my colleagues have given to this limited but valuable Measure.

I appreciate the remarks made by my neighbour, the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley), about the contribution that the Government—public finance—have made, and will continue to make, towards York Minister. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, who is on the Front Bench tonight, probably hesitated to intervene in the debate because the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman are not strictly within the ambit of the Measure—he might even be out of order if he attempted to intervene from the Front Bench. However, I am sure that he will have heard the remarks made and the queries raised by the hon. Gentleman. One of us will communicate with him specifically to respond to the points made.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made a couple of points. I promised that I would try to answer his first intervention. Despite the title that it bears, Bath abbey is a parish church and therefore is covered by the care of churches legislation. All other churches which are consecrated as parish churches are likewise covered by the existing church facilities which we debated and passed in 1991. Churches that are not strictly consecrated but are so-called dedicated—that could even include chapels in hospitals and such things—are subject to the faculty jurisdiction by the direction of the bishop. That just about encompasses all conceivable sorts of church buildings which might be relevant to the debate.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Mappa Mundi, for example. I am glad to be able to tell him that the control mechanism in the Care of Cathedrals Measure which he and I debated and which was passed in 1990 covers not only fabric changes but the disposal by sale or otherwise of outstanding movables, to give them their technical term. So Mappa Mundi is subject to enforcement of that Measure.

Against that background, I hope that the House will agree to give a fair wind to the Measure tonight.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Care of Cathedrals (Supplementary Provisions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

Metropolitan Police (Firearms)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

10.38 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the important and topical subject of the arming of the Metropolitan police. I thank the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for coming along tonight to give the Government's response. I am sure that his considered comments will create considerable interest.

Last month, Sir Paul Condon—the House will wish to congratulate the distinguished Metropolitan Police Commissioner on his knighthood—announced that his officers will in the future openly wear handguns on London streets in certain circumstances. I have carefully read through the resulting press coverage of that announcement, and I am astonished how inaccurate and exaggerated much of it was.

What the Home Secretary in fact agreed was that officers in armed response vehicles—ARVs—in London can wear their side arms in holsters at all times. Previously, they armed only when they reached the incident to which they had been called. They needed the permission of a high-ranking officer, who in practice had to be contacted via his bleeper at all hours of the day or night, before removing guns from a secure metal box in their car.

In London, officers in ARVs are dedicated to attending incidents in which firearms are being or may be used. Clearly those side arms will not be visible while jerseys are worn, but when officers are in shirt sleeves only, they will become visible in their holsters.

That is a comparatively small step, and is by no means unreasonable. The purpose of our brief debate, however, is to consider the arming of the Metropolitan police in a much wider context and over a longer time. Here I must express a long-held sense of unease, which I am confident that I share with many of my constituents in Bexleyheath, Welling and Barnehurst.

I will put my case in simple terms. I claim that during the past 20 years more weapons have been placed in police armouries. I claim that more automatic weapons have been given to the police, some with astonishingly high rates of fire. I claim that, if that trend continues during the next 20 years, the British police service—the Met traditionally sets the pace—will become much more like many of its European counterparts and many more police officers will carry weapons on duty, and perhaps even off duty as happens abroad. I claim that there is a certain ratchet effect. The decisions go in one direction, and it is very seldom reversed. Finally, I claim that that long-term trend, which has involved a number of Commissioners and Home Secretaries and is probably not supported by a majority of Members of Parliament representing London, is almost certainly not proceeding with the blessing of those people who pay towards the funding of the Metropolitan police, namely the people of London.

There are two basic approaches to the police carrying guns. There is that adopted in most states of the United States, where the police carry guns as a matter of routine and where many police patrols have considerable fire power at their disposal. I suggest that it becomes normal in such circumstances to cock guns and not to hesitate too long before firing them. Then there is the approach adopted in Britain and a few other countries, where the police go about their duties unarmed except for a truncheon. There are hosts of arguments to be deployed, but at the end of the day I am fiercely proud of the British approach and I speak tonight in favour of its being continued and not undermined.

There must be—and Parliament has seen to it that there are—very heavy penalties for criminals who go about their business carrying knives and guns. It follows that the courts must not hesitate to use the powers that they have been given when the facts have been properly established. That must be the starting point, rather than attempting to match weapon for weapon. At the same time, it is vital that it gets harder—not easier, as is the case now—for criminals to obtain guns in the Greater London area. There must be a crack-down on the number of arms imported into the United Kingdom. I am well aware how difficult that is to achieve. There must be a determined drive to find the weapons which are held illegally in our major cities, and they must be seized and destroyed. Perhaps more amnesties are called for. I suggest that at present too many firearms certificates are issued. In 1992, the Metropolitan police issued 9,427. I believe that they are far too easy to obtain.

Some years ago, I applied for a shotgun licence at a police station a few hundred yards from here at the request of a national newspaper. I was not examined as to why I needed a shotgun while living in London.

Winston Churchill wrote a wonderful description of the battle of Sidney street in the east end of London when he was Home Secretary. My hon. Friends may recall the superb remark of Balfour after Churchill was photographed risking his life at the scene. He commented:

> "I understand what the photographer was doing, but what was the right hon. Gentleman doing?"

A detachment of 20 Scots Guards armed with rifles had been summoned to deal with three Russian anarchists after some policemen had been killed.

I suggest that the Army should be called in more often today when the authorities believe that rifles and sub-machine guns would be appropriate. By all means, let us match armed bank robbers with an armed response team. But if it is thought that the Provisional IRA or other terrorists are present, why are we so reluctant to call on the Army to support the police?

It is becoming commonplace when terrorists are being tried in London to watch on our television sets armed police on the rooftops near the court in those ridiculous baseball caps which are so fashionable among schoolboys, wearing body armour and carrying sub-machine guns, and perhaps rifles with telescopic sights. The serious point is that this does the image of the constabulary no good at all. I would take some persuading that sharpshooters serve any real purpose on those occasions. If they really are essential, why do we not use the snipers of, say, the Royal Green Jackets? The public understand that soldiers need to be trained in the use of sniper rifles, telescopic sights and night-firing aids, but does the same apply to Metropolitan policemen? The Army can offer a broad range of support to the Commissioner from, at one end of the scale, a Royal Military policeman with a revolver to those highly trained specialists of the Special Air Services so brilliantly sent into action during the Iranian embassy siege. I would put it to senior police officers that, just as the public were soured by the disappearance of the bobby on the beat in favour of high-speed patrol cars—a trend which happily is being reversed—so, too, they are alienated by the regular sight on television of heavily armed police officers on our streets.

In a fine piece of journalism in The Times on 18 May, Simon Jenkins wrote that the police, who deserve every support,

> "would help themselves if they stopped calling press conferences . . . with photographs of policemen dressed as John Wayne, courtesy of Messrs Smith and Wesson and Messrs Heckler and Koch."

Senior police officers should appreciate that many Londoners would agree with that comment. The article continued, after referring to the criminals who import and sell cocaine and crack, by saying:

> "One country has wide experience of using a heavily armed police and paramilitary force to stamp out the cocaine trade. It is the United States of America. The result has been a disaster for the American police and especially for its relations with black people. Local police forces send one delegation after another to Britain to learn how we do it better."

Policemen to whom I talk seem divided in their views on that issue, but most do not want an armed police force. They feel that such a move would encourage criminals to carry arms, especially quick-firing weapons. They are not convinced that it would save police lives in the long run —we are all thinking of a particular tragic event. They remind me that not all police men and women are suitable for weapons training and that the equipment is expensive to buy and maintain at a time when money is scarce.

Problems also exist in the secure storing of weapons. Some police officers mention that, each year, a significant number of police officers in America are killed by their own weapons and that members of the public there are not infrequently injured when a shoot-out occurs, as happens all too often. Most of them know that fewer police officers in Britain are being assaulted each year, even if that fact is not known to the public. Last year, 3,370 London police officers were assaulted while on duty but five years ago the figure was almost 5,000.

In the real world, although more guns are being used in crimes—I gather that replicas are a particular problem—they are rarely fired at police officers. The figures are clear on that point. Police officers know that they are respected by the public because they are prepared to face danger unarmed. It is a tradition of which they can be proud. Some recall, too, the bad publicity that followed the police shooting of Stephen Waldorf. In a recent issue of the Police Review I came across a warning by Mr. Jim Sharples, the Merseyside chief constable and chairman of the Association of Chief Police Officers' Firearms Committee. He said:

> "Arming the police would mark an irreversible change which could have unknown implications for the service and the community. Such a move would have unpredictable effects. Would an arming of police . . . lead to an even greater carriage of arms by criminals? Would even more injuries and death ensue?"

During my time as an infantry soldier I carried a weapon while on active service. My experience was that, even among the best trained soldiers, accidental discharges were bound to occur and preventing weapons from falling into the wrong hands, including those of children, was a constant problem. Police forces already have difficulties looking after their own weapons. The Times reported a few weeks ago that two loaded police handguns were found lying in a street in the centre of Blackburn, Lancashire, after apparently falling from an armed response vehicle. A passer-by handed them in to the nearest police station. Think for a moment what might have followed had those loaded weapons come the way of one of Her Majesty's less well disposed subjects. My observation is that the more weapons are carried by the police, the more such incidents are bound to occur and the more people will suffer injuries as a result.

In a recent professional survey of police officers, paperwork and bureaucracy ranked higher than violence against the police. Nevertheless, I support refresher training in self-defence for police officers throughout their careers. I would welcome my hon. Friend's comments on that point. And protective vests should be more readily available. Few people object to police officers in the capital carrying the new-style baton, which is longer than the traditional wooden truncheon, while hoping never to be on the receiving end. Medical tests on devices such as pepper sprays must be speeded up. Perhaps my hon. Friend would comment on that, too.

While announcing in May a doubling in the number of London ARVs from five to 12, the Commissioner apparently said that the further carrying of guns by his officers would be "event driven". That odd phrase concerns me. It rather suggests the initiative being passed by the goodies to the baddies. Does the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State accept that if there are more armed robberies in the Metropolitan police area, the police will be bound to respond by carrying more arms? I hope not. I like to think that the Home Secretary has some over-arching strategy, and that the traditional character of British policing and its humane face will be enhanced. I like to think that if, in the next 20 years, the terrorist threat diminishes in Greater London—and there must be a good chance that it will—there will be fewer ARVs and fewer armed policemen as a result.

Police officers up to the rank of chief inspector are to be balloted about whether they wish to have the > "right to carry firearms in the course of normal duties".

It is important that the Home Office's considered advice is well publicised in advance of that little referendum. The possible arming of the police will remain high on the political agenda.The basis of my brief submission is that Britain leads the world in community-based policing, and that that is helped by the lack of conspicuous weapons. We have a right to look to our Government to give a lead. I trust that they will continue to make clear their determined opposition to a general arming of our police forces, who at the end of the day do us proud.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend on raising this important issue and I welcome an opportunity to explain to the House the recent changes that have been made and then to put them into context. I agree with many of my hon. Friend's sentiments. I also join him in congratulating the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on his knighthood.

My hon. Friend is right to assert that the changes recently announced by Sir Paul Condon are modest. However, he spoke of longer-term trends and extrapolated from that a gloomy picture for some years hence. I think that he strikes too pessimistic a note and I shall seek to reassure him by my remarks.

My hon. Friend also spoke about an amnesty for people who hold firearms illegally. I understand the attractions of that, but I am bound to tell him that, as I am sure he appreciates, it is a delicate judgment because, if one has an amnesty with any semblance of regularity, it allows a person to think, "Perhaps I shall wait for the next amnesty." Nevertheless, I understand his argument. I am bound to say, as I know that he appreciates, that the deployment of authorised firearms officers for whatever purpose—whether as sharpshooters, as he describes it, or as anything else—is an operational judgment for the chief officer, and in this case for the Commissioner.

Before turning to the specific question of the overt arming of some Metropolitan police officers, I shall explain the range of measures being taken to offer greater protection to the police. It is important to set the issue in that context because the recent changes spring solely from a desire to protect officers more effectively as they carry out their duties. The changes are not the first moves in a fundamental change to the style of policing in the Metropolitan police district.

The physical danger that police officers confront on behalf of the rest of us cannot, and should not, be forgotten, and my hon. Friend made the same argument. The tragic deaths of PC Patrick Dunn and Sergeant Derek Robertson in the past year have brought that home to all of us. The risk in policing cannot be removed entirely and there is no infallible protection available, but a great deal can be done, and is being done, through a range of co-ordinated measures.

The recent change which has precipitated the debate relates only to Metropolitan police officers in armed response vehicles—ARVs, as my hon. Friend called them—attending incidents at which armed officers are judged to be operationally necessary. ARVs carry carbines and sidearms and, until recently, the specific authority of a senior officer was required for either of those weapons to be removed from the locked box in which they are transported. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has recently agreed that, from now on, ARV officers in London can wear their sidearms overtly.

ARVs are usually on patrol so that they can be readily available should it be necessary to respond to a firearms incident. Where such an incident takes place, the ARV may be deployed either at the direction of a senior officer or on the initiative of ARV crew members who may observe an incident in the course of their patrol.

In London, ARV crews are deployed only where there is a perceived firearms or other lethal threat. It therefore makes sense for them to have the immediate capacity to defend themselves and others. The previous procedures, which involved retrieving weapons from the fixed locked box in the back of a fast moving vehicle, can be unsafe.

In operational terms, the handguns carried by ARV officers would be clearly visible only when they are in shirtsleeve order. My hon. Friend alluded to that. They will still require authorisation to remove their carbines from the locked box in the ARV.

Routine arming of the police is simply not the issue here—that would be a fundamental change to the style of policing. What is intended is that the police should be given the protection they need to do their job. Far from shifting towards routine arming of police officers, the Commissioner has said that the average member of the public will never see—unless he is travelling through Heathrow airport—officers routinely carrying guns on the street. I am only sorry that media coverage following this recent change has given an impression to the contrary.

My hon. Friend suggested that the Army should be used at incidents currently dealt with by armed police officers. I am not persuaded of that. Of course, there have been and may again be particular incidents in which the expertise of the armed services are called upon. However, for the regular policing needs of London, the right response is from police officers who will be unarmed in the vast majority of cases, but who must, when operationally necessary, have access to appropriate firearms.

I agree with my hon. Friend that we should keep a clear dividing line between the work of the police and the work of the Army. They have different jobs to do and different methods. One of the great strengths of British policing is precisely that the police are the police and the Army is the Army. We have always been careful not to mix them up. That is why I would not want the Army drawn into police work any more than is absolutely necessary, even if it were practicable to do so.

I hope that I have made it absolutely clear that we are not talking about routine arming or anything close to it. Although routine arming might, in some cases, assist morale, it will not often help against sudden and unexpected attack. In my view, routine arming does not have a realistic place in the balance that needs to be reached between giving proper weight to protecting officers against attack and protecting the character of policing in this country, of which my hon. Friend spoke.

The House may wish to know that the present number of authorised firearms officers in the Metropolitan police has decreased by almost 600 compared with the number of such officers in 1991. The number now is just over 1,950; in 1991, it was 2,583—hardly evidence of a move towards the routine arming of the police.

However, in responding to police anxieties about the dangers that the police face, we must not concentrate exclusively on the debate about arming. The risk of other, lesser assaults is much greater, as the figures show. In the past six years throughout England and Wales, four officers have been killed by firearms and about 50 more have been injured, the majority not seriously. Those figures can be set against annual figures for England and Wales of between 17,000 and 18,000 a year for all assaults on police officers, a little over 300 of which occurred in the Metropolitan police district. Incidentally, the figures for overall assaults have not risen in recent years—indeed, they have fallen slightly—although I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that they remain unacceptably high.

We believe that a great deal can be done to offer greater protection to police officers through a range of co-ordinated measures. The truncheon can be made more effective. A number of alternatives have been or are being trialled. The main trial is that of the expandable side-handled baton and we are providing technical support for that. Interim reports from those trials have been received and I understand that the results so far emerging are encouraging. This equipment greatly improves the confidence of officers and it also promises to be a highly effective tool of control and restraint. That is important in itself. Research recently carried out by the Home Office shows that one half of all injuries to officers are sustained while suspects are restrained. The results of the trials are now being considered by the Association of Chief Police Officers and a final decision is imminent.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has already made clear, from the evidence so far we are likely to support any chief officer who decides to introduce the baton. Exercising his special responsibilities as police authority for the Metropolitan police, my right hon. and learned Friend has agreed to proposals by the Commissioner to introduce two types of 22 in baton and other new batons will join the list if we are satisfied that they properly meet the undoubted need.

Body armour is also necessary in some circumstances. Many of us would have thought that it was not beyond modern technology to produce body armour that provides effective protection against knife and gun attacks and is comfortable to wear all day. However, the Home Office police scientific development branch and ACPO do not consider that there is yet such a product.

Body armour is issued for firearms incidents and stab-resistant and dual-purpose vests are increasingly purchased by forces. Chief officers will, of course, do everything they can and I commend the vest trials which are taking place in the Metropolitan police. Such trials are needed if we are to find the right product.

The Home Office is, with ACPO, considering whether pepper spray is the good thing that, by many reports, it seems to be held to be in America. Curiously, it has not been subjected to the vigorous health checks that one would expect in the United States and we must be concerned about evidence that it may be carcinogenic. I have a particular concern for officers who would be deploying it, for the simple reason that they are the most likely to experience frequent exposure.

We agree with ACPO that the issue must be resolved as speedily as possible before we can make further progress. We have been advised by the Department of Health that we should be able to get a clearer answer within months, given the right scientific research. We have, of course, asked for the necessary work to be put in hand. It is, I am sure, an essential step in reaching a position where decisions can safely be made about whether and if so in what circumstance pepper spray should be used.

A few moments ago, I referred to the number of assaults in the Metropolitan police area. I thought that I said something over 3,000. I am advised by an alert observer that I may have said over 300. If I did, I correct myself here and now. The figure I had clearly in mind and in front of me was over 3,000 and I apologise if I said the wrong figure.

I hope that, by putting the recent justifiable changes to the way in which armed officers carry their sidearms into the wider context of the measures being taken to offer the police better protection, I have shown the House that, far from representing a fundamental shift in policing, they are a measured response to changing circumstances. We must remain flexible and imaginative in our response to the shifting changes which confront police officers as they go about their duties; that is our intent.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 17 June 1994

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Points of Order

9.34 am

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Given the great interest in today's three debates, and given the special circumstances, which the House will understand, is it possible to place a time limit on speeches today?

Madam Speaker: I am not in a position to put a time limit on speeches today. The timetable for today's debate is in the hands of the House.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): On a different point of order, Madam Speaker. Overnight, we have heard the worrying news of many redundancies at Devonport dockyard. Have you been given any indication of a statement on that disturbing news, which has some bearing on our first debate?

Madam Speaker: No, I have not been informed by any Department that a Minister is seeking to make a statement today.

Competitiveness

9.35 am

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): I beg to move,

> That this House recognises that it is only through the competitiveness of the United Kingdom that wealth is generated, and calls for a flexible business-friendly environment which encourages aggressive exporting, investment and innovation at home and abroad, unencumbered by excessive regulation, high social wage costs and statutory minimum wages.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to air my views on an issue which concerns us all. The publishing of the White Paper on competitiveness just before the recess was extremely useful. Even if the White Paper had not been published, however, I should still have chosen this subject.

All hon. Members will agree that competitive industry and a competitive business base in the United Kingdom are crucial to produce wealth and to generate the profits and money necessary to achieve the sort of society that all of us wish to see.

Most hon. Members present will be relieved to hear that I have no intention of going through the White Paper in great detail. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] It is kind of hon. Members to suggest that I might go through it in great detail, but I know that some hon. Members want to concentrate on specific aspects and it is only fair to give them the opportunity to voice their views. If I were to cover the White Paper in great detail, I would take up all of this five-hour debate. My voice would probably give up long before then.

I was fascinated by the reaction to the White Paper. I was delighted that the Confederation of British Industry, the Engineering Employers Federation, the Institute of Directors, small businesses and even trade unions were pleased with it and welcomed it for its thorough analysis, for its wide variety of recommendations on the work that the Government plan to undertake and for pointing businesses, employers and employees in the right direction to a more competitive economy.

I was fascinated by the fact that the Opposition did not like the White Paper—probably, I suspect, because it did not recommend throwing public money at businesses, having a development bank or picking winners.

The White Paper makes it clear what each player involved in the game of producing wealth and generating goods and services can do. It encapsulates a broad cultural theme—the need to change, much of which has already been done. I do not wish to rehearse all the events of the 1980s, but the changes in industrial relations, the increase in the number of small businesses, the return to management of control of their businesses, the welcome new emphasis on exporting and the improvements in quality control are already under way.

In terms of quality control, the importance of businesses acquiring BS5750 status cannot be overstressed. The improvement in production and production methods that the standard brings about—this may sound double Dutch to some—is crucial to businesses being accepted both in the United Kingdom and abroad. Businesses should also be aware of the international standard 9000.

I know that there are worries about BS5750. I am aware that it requires continual management and the concentration of employees on the systems that have been set up. There is a danger if 5750 becomes set in concrete. It must be recognised that it should be an evolving standard and process. We must ensure that businesses continue to—

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor and Maidenhead): Does my hon. Friend accept that for smaller firms BS5750 puts a great burden on their resources and time? Many such firms feel that it is essential to get 5750 status because so many firms that they supply insist on the standard. In some instances, however, it has become a pointless and damaging exercise for small firms.

Mrs. Lait: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because it reflects some of the worries that have been voiced to me. They go to the core of the changes that are being considered in the context of 5750 systems. I can assure my hon. Friend, however, that some extremely small businesses find the standard a key to their success and have found the resources to concentrate on it. Several small companies in my constituency that employ only a few people have made 5750 the key to their management systems.

Mr. Peter Butler (Milton Keynes, North-East): My hon. Friend may be interested to know that experience shows that companies without 5750 talk different languages and cannot communicate between themselves easily. Companies with 5750—it is sponsored by the British Standards Institution, which is based in my constituency and with which I am negotiating in seeking 5750 for myself, so as to be the first Member so accredited—can communicate between themselves and, therefore, become more effective. Whether firms are small or large, the need for them to communicate and to become more effective is exactly the same.

Mrs. Lait: I can do no more than endorse my hon. Friend's recommendations and suggest that perhaps collectively—as 651 Members—we should acquire 5750 status.

Having concentrated for some time on the need to improve standards in business, I think it important to set the need for greater competitiveness in the United Kingdom in its proper context, which is global market competition. Our businesses do not function solely within the UK. We are not functioning only in the European Union or the European continent. Equally, we are not functioning only in the Commonwealth. The reality is that we are in a global market. Our competitors come from countries that we have not taken much account of in the past. They are coming from Asia and are known commonly as the Asia tigers. They, even more than the United States and Japan, are the countries and the companies that we need to be looking to, not merely to compete with and sell to, but to learn lessons from.

We must not look within Europe alone to provide the standards of business within the United Kingdom. We must focus on customers in the huge world market to which I have drawn attention. They are customers who are used to wide choice and to high quality, and those are the keys to our competitiveness.

We need to ensure that, as a country, our companies are on top of the demand for new goods and new technologies. We must adapt to meet changes. I am sure that many hon. Members, bearing in mind some of the battles that have taken place over the past 15 years, will realise that the reluctance to adapt and to meet changes has been one of our greatest problems. There have been difficulties in persuading the nation of the need to change and adapt. It is a battle which we cannot afford to lose. It must be recognised that if the battle is lost, we shall never be able to compete in the world market. As part of the adaptation to meet changes, we must ensure that businesses are free.

It is interesting that we are still talking about manufacturing industry. Various organisations commented on the White Paper and many of them said, "It is good to see the Government focusing on a manufacturing policy and an industrial policy." Over many years, I have been bothered by the artificial division between services and manufacturing. We have, for example, a successful computer hardware exporting operation. That is regarded as manufacturing industry. The software to go with it is an equally successful operation. It might be said that it is more successful than the hardware operation because much of it is home generated. It is regarded as being part of the service industry.

We must re-examine the definition of services, which includes education services. In Hastings, for example, English language schools are a large part of the local economy. They are earning good export money. They are still regarded as services. Sport is an export. Rubbish and cleaning services—known in the colloquialism of statisticians as sanitary services—are earning us export money. Another relevant sector is posts and telecommunications. I do not wish to be too controversial, but it must be recognised that British Telecom has done brilliantly in exporting its services. One of the reasons for wishing to make changes to the Post Office is to ensure that it, too, can do the same.

We must get away from artificial distinctions between manufacturing and services, which, in the past, have led to the psychological impact of some jobs being classified as real and others not—if someone is in manufacturing he has a real job; if someone else is in services, he cannot have a real job. We must concentrate on removing these artificial distinctions. After all, services accounted for 17 per cent. of world trade in 1992, as against 15.6 per cent. in 1984. That shows us how important services are and how crucial they will be to the development of our economy. I do not subscribe—

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I am following the hon. Lady's argument closely and with a great measure of agreement. Does she feel that the report that came out yesterday about the condition of London and the significance of London in Britain's service trading, and the way that its position is being undermined by neglect, is a source of great concern?

Mrs. Lait: I shall talk about the City in due course. I shall argue that, given the City's importance in world financial markets, without wishing to be complacent, we will continue to dominate world financial services. London will, therefore, continue to be a crucial player in world markets.

In the United Kingdom, the service industry is worth £12.6 billion. Its value has increased by 121 per cent. since 1982. That explains, perhaps, why over the past decade there has been criticism that we have concentrated too much on services and not sufficiently on manufacturing. I see these operations as one seamless whole. I hope very much that we shall begin to change our attitudes and, hence, the classification of different industries so that we can recognise their important roles.

It is in the service industries—the information and knowledge industries, for example—where the Asian economies have become so dominant. That has happened because they have flexible economies. They do not have the rigidities of the European continent and of the European Community. We have taken the lead within the Union in trying to free up our economies. It is an interesting fact that the results of the European elections may strengthen our elbow in continuing to lobby for that.

We must consider the Italian Government under Mr. Berlusconi and whatever one might think of the politics of the anti-Maastrichters in France, they have at least brought to that debate a more sensible and balanced view of how the French economy needs to be opened up.

Who becomes the President of the Commission is crucial. I was delighted to see my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister supporting so strongly our candidate, as he has been the key in the Community in terms of mergers and competition policy.

We have said on many occasions that the Community should be opened up and made more flexible through social and labour policies. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report and the charges and counter-charges about the statutory minimum wage are timely.

I have read all the OECD report and it contains only two references to the statutory minimum wage, although much of the report implies criticism of it. The OECD report states that Europe is motivated to protect people from the vicissitudes of economic life. The European Community has tried to protect them through social welfare and the effect has been to rigidify the economies' ability to change.

No Conservative Member would disagree with that sentiment. I have no desire to rehearse the arguments about social wage costs and the statutory minimum wage. However, it is worth bringing to the attention of the House the references in the OECD report to the problems that have arisen as a result of a very tight social wage structure and the statutory minimum wage.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): Is my hon. Friend aware that the statutory minimum wage has been such a success in France that the French have now withdrawn and reduced it?

Mrs. Lait: That was a key issue in one of the last bouts of civil unrest in France. Most of us were horrified to see the effects of that, as it probably reminded many of us of our problems in the 1970s which were caused by rigid social wage policies.

The OECD recognises that the statutory minimum wage is a barrier to employment. It can support a statutory minimum wage only if there is a clear policy decision to reduce poverty, when a statutory minimum wage system should relate only to prices and not to average earnings and should differentiate between age and regions so that it is flexible. That must be contrary to the Opposition's concept of a statutory minimum wage.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): If the problem in the 1970s was one of rigid wages, why was the growth rate in the 1970s far higher than it has been since 1979 when the Government have pursued precisely the opposite policy?

Mrs. Lait: We do not have a statutory wage policy, but, if my memory is correct, I recall that on many occasions the Labour party attempted to have a statutory wage policy, but that was broken time and again by the trade unions. Most of us remember the horrors of the winter of 1978 which were the result of having a statutory wage policy.

I do not want to spend too much time on the statutory minimum wage. I simply wanted to demolish the arguments about its being a way of making our economy competitive in the world.

We need more changes in the European Union, because we must break down the rigidities in the employment market which are leading to barriers to employment. We are excluding people from the employment market because of the rigidities in the system.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): If the United Kingdom is so much more flexible and less rigid than the European Union, why has our economic growth lagged behind that of all the other European Union nations since 1979 except for Denmark and Greece?

Mrs. Lait: It has taken us 10 years to get rid of the rigidities that the Labour party brought into the system.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): May I remind my hon. Friend and the House that the 1980s were the only post-war decade in which our economy grew faster than those of Germany, France and Italy?

Mrs. Lait: I thank my right hon. Friend for that information. I support that point, because we are all aware from constituency experience of the difference that that growth has made.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): Before my hon. Friend leaves her point about rigidities in the labour market, did she hear the comments on the radio this morning of one of the Labour leadership contenders, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who indicated in fairly clear terms that, as leader of the Labour party, she would be looking to restore rights of secondary picketing in this country? That would be a serious backward step for trade union relations and for the economy generally.

Mrs. Lait: That only goes to show the type of Labour party that we will be able to challenge successfully at the next election, whoever wins the leadership battle.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): I should like to join this bandwagon. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Transport and General Workers Union, the biggest dinosaur of them all, has this morning thrown its weight behind the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)?

Mrs. Lait: That simply reinforces the pleasure that we should all feel about the right hon. Lady becoming leader of the Labour party. We encourage her candidature.

Mr. Cousins: The hon. Lady should have taken careful note of the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) about her commitment to positive rights at work. Does the idea of staff, employees and managers having positive rights at work have any echo of sympathy in the hon. Lady?

Mrs. Lait: Every employee, of whatever status, already has rights at work. One of the strengths of the development in the United Kingdom economy is that those rights at work are beginning to devolve down from company level to working level. Therefore, people can enter into direct discussions with their employers about those rights at work, payments and benefits which match the conditions of the company and the local economy. That is crucial to the flexible economy that we need in this country. That is underpinned by a legal system which ensures that everyone has direct legal rights.

Mr. Cousins: We are now quite clear: the hon. Lady is advocating a positive right for staff to discuss matters concerning the enterprise and the business with their employers. The hon. Lady is saying that that positive right should be included in law. That is very commendable.

Mrs. Lait: I like the hon. Gentleman's attempt to put words into my mouth, but that was not what I said. The direction in which our economy is moving, a direction of which I approve, is one in which employees and employers have a direct relationship in terms of remuneration and benefits. That must be the key to the flexible economy that we need to compete in the world. It is the world that we need to compete in, not the European Community. While the European Community as a whole is becoming increasingly uncompetitive, the United Kingdom is becoming increasingly competitive in the world. That is the direction in which we should be going.

Mr. Butler: I am afraid that my hon. Friend may inadvertently have been slightly misled by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson). I listened for several minutes to the interview with the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) when she spoke about secondary picketing. I heard the right hon. Lady asked about four times what her view was, and the most that she would say was that her view was very well known; she would not actually say what it was.

[Mr. Butler]

I had to turn off after the fourth attempt to obtain an answer. Perhaps she subsequently answered. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne has thrown an extremely red herring into the water. I do not think that the right hon. Lady has a view on secondary picketing, and I would not wish her to be unfairly castigated for the possession of a view that she does not hold.

Mrs. Lait: I appreciate my hon. Friend's comments. I reiterate only that that makes the right hon. Lady an even better candidate for the Labour leadership.

I should like to make progress, because I would hate to be accused of filibustering. I have a large part of my speech still to make and it is about time I moved on to the further changes that are required in the European Union in order to make our companies more flexible. That matter was encapsulated by a paper that I received from the Chemical Industries Association Ltd., a body for which I worked in the early 1980s. The chemical industry is one of our most successful industries, both internationally and within the European Community. The association is exceedingly worried about the need for the European Union to look much more strategically at international requirements for company structures.

We need within the European Union a better understanding of global markets, how very large companies need to play in global markets, what constitutes mergers and monopolies, and when there should be interference in company changes. We need to consider cross-border transactions, shareholdings, deals on plant sales and so on which are crucial to the development of the chemical industry. Also, the European Union has not yet got the legal structure right in respect of co-operative joint ventures. They need to be streamlined and made much speedier and much more responsive to changes in world demand, which the chemical industry can be, as can many other successful international players in the industrial world.

Mr. Cousins: Is the hon. Lady saying that she supports the principle of European companies organised on a similar basis in respect of shareholders and stakeholders right across Europe? If so, how does she support the opt-out from so many aspects that the present Government, whom she supports, have carried out?

Mrs. Lait: The hon. Gentleman is trying to develop the concept of European companies. I am not entirely convinced that the body of law that is required for that is easily created. In the middle of the 1980s, great efforts went into trying to create European companies with the necessary legal requirements, and the idea fell upon the differences in national legal terms. We have to ensure that the European Union is capable of reacting flexibly to the requirements of the international industries that we need in order to be competitive throughout the world.

Mr. Butler: Does my hon. Friend accept that, contrary to the intervention by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), there is a significant difference between a company which operates in more than one European country operating similar systems throughout its operations for the benefit of itself and its employees and that company being required under the social chapter to operate totally ineffectual but very expensive regulations and compliance systems which do nothing for the company, its employees or its competitiveness? The Labour party is unable to distinguish between those two models, but does my hon. Friend accept that that is a clear and proper distinction?

Mrs. Lait: Indeed I do. I could not have put it better myself.

Mr. Butler: My hon. Friend probably could.

Mrs. Lait: I would not have attempted to put it better myself, and I certainly do not want to repeat it. I am very conscious of time passing, and I want to make progress.

Several industries have expressed concern about the need for the United Kingdom to ensure that our civil servants are seconded at a high enough level within the European Commission to be influential, that we take up our complete quota of them, and that the system rewards them rather than penalises them for working in Brussels. I express an heretical thought: France and Germany exchange civil servants so that they grow up through the system knowing one another terribly well and can always telephone François or Helmut, so we should do exactly the same and set up such agreements with other European Union countries. I have no strong feeling about which countries they should be—

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): Greece.

Mrs. Lait: It would help the Greek economy no end to have a few British civil servants.

Mr. Butler rose—

Mrs. Lait: I am beginning to feel slightly under pressure.

Mr. Butler: I would not wish to put my hon. Friend under pressure in any context whatsoever. I hope that she will recall that as our relationship develops slowly but positively over the years ahead. She happens, though, to have released from the closet, as it were, a hobby horse of mine. Never mind exchanging civil servants; would it not be an excellent idea throughout Europe to have a mutual exchange of, for example, health inspectors, abattoir inspectors, veterinary inspectors and compliance inspectors? It is not that one believes for one moment that the Italians, Greeks, Spanish or French administer rules any less rigorously than we do, but, to reassure those who are more sceptical than my hon. Friend and I are about such matters that that is, indeed, the case, would not such an exchange have very positive benefits?

Mrs. Lait: There would indeed be an exceedingly positive benefits. I should like to see people's reactions when reciprocal inspectors from Greece and Spain appear in our environmental health departments.

There is another issue in respect of which the Department of Trade and Industry can help directly. Many industries complain that it is difficult for them to take part as advisers on European Union committees. Such committees are legion and they take enormous time, but they are crucial in developing the common European standards that we need in order to complete the single market. Many industrialists say that their counterparts in other countries are helped financially in terms of fares and so on to take part in those committees, whereas our companies must cover the cost from their own income. For a small business in a high-tech sector, that can produce great strains, but such participation is necessary to ensure that industry's survival. It would help if my right hon. Friend the Minister could tell me whether that idea has floated across desks at the DTI.

I have spoken at great length about greater flexibility within the European Union, and I should now like briefly to go back to the subject of employment and talk about the need to get away from rigid working hours.

In some of the recent BBC strikes, we have seen some of the consequences of old-fashioned rigidities. Those strikes were often castigated because they exposed practices such as soft shoes for studio staff and macs for political reporters. We see exactly the same problems in Germany, where, interestingly, the post office is being privatised, but part of the privatisation is to buy out some of the perks of the German postie, which include lemonade when the temperature is above 80 deg F and tea and coffee when it is below 14 deg F—let me try to keep within the same temperature system. Silly rigidities are limiting employment opportunities and ensuring that our economies still have some way to go before they are sufficiently flexible to meet the challenges from Asia.

We cannot afford to be a fortress Europe. We will be besieged by goods from outside, and eventually we will be starved into defeat. That is one reason why the single market is so crucial and why the United Kingdom pressed so hard for it. Of course, as a consequence of developing a single market, we have seen a fall out in the United Kingdom, as we have had to reconcile our traditional cultural and legal patterns of work which, in some respects, has caused great pain.

In some areas, we are way ahead—for instance, on copyright. But in our constituencies, we have all had to deal with the dissatisfaction that has been brought about by excessive regulation, for example, as we move towards the single market.

I welcome the Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill. I hope that the constitutional device included in it and recommended to another place by the House of Commons goes through that place without any problems, because it chills me to think of the consequences of having to deal with every single part of deregulation and re-regulation through primary and secondary legislation in this House. We need to be able to move forward.

I must tell the House that some of the regulatory madness continues. CMR in my constituency is a small chemical company which recycles chemicals—most people would approve of that. The company has discovered that regulations that came into effect on 6 May require the companies to have bonds for the chemicals that are used, in case there is an accident, which would require cleaning up by one of the waste authorities.

When the regulations came into effect, the bonds did not exist; insurance companies were not prepared to provide them and banks had not even heard of the regulations, as far as I could find out. We are, therefore, left with a situation where there is no good mechanism for companies to be able to comply with regulations after they come into place. I deplore that. When regulations are still required, and it is agreed that they are required, there should be more thought about how they are implemented.

I also have the pleasure of having a division of Philips in my constituency. Many hon. Members will know that I regularly talk about the weakness of the Hastings economy, but Philips is one of my outstandingly good examples because it has gone from the threat of complete closure to being the centre of the Philips kettle-making division for world markets. However, one of the issues that Philips must deal with is one that many of us, especially those who have bought electrical goods over the years, have regularly complained about—the absence of a plug at the end of the lead and the fact that we must buy one separately.

At present, there is great confusion about whether the provision of a plug will be required by law. Of course, the question whether there will be a legal requirement to put a plug on the end of the lead, or whether it can be done as a gesture to the consumer, makes a big difference to companies such as Philips. If hon. Members have bought electrical equipment recently, they may have noticed that more and more such equipment has the plug attached, and that greatly reduces the irritability factor for the consumer. It would be helpful for producers to know whether they are legally required to produce a plug. That will come under regulation—then again, it may not.

The package that was produced when the White Paper on competitiveness was published included a report on the regulation initiatives of the Health and Safety Executive. I and many of the companies that I have spoken to welcome the Health and Safety Executive approach. When I was working on the deregulation issue, I was interested to find that the HSE and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution were two of the least criticised bodies. I suppose that, because they are of such high quality, they were the first bodies to come out with ways of changing their approach.

I am impressed by the fact that, at long last, the HSE has decided to move towards goal setting and away from prescriptive targets. That is the best way forward, and it will make things much easier for companies.

I also welcome the fact that, after many years of problems, the HSE is beginning to focus much more clearly in a public way on risk assessment. Risk assessment is exceedingly emotive but little understood. I often describe it simply as assessing the risk brought about by Chernobyl: most of us probably got more radiation from watching television reports of Chernobyl than we ever did from Chernobyl itself. That is a simple way of putting over to people the meaning of risk assessment.

The problem is that we are beginning to create a society in which risk is being taken out, so that we become less and less able to assess risks to ourselves, our neighbours, our family and our friends. If the HSE can begin to focus on that in a more coherent and sensible way, I can only approve of it.

Mr. Butler: This is not only a problem within the HSE. Does my hon. Friend recall the recent case of the photographer who managed to step on to a slippery part of a breakwater, or some similar construction, and fall in the sea? He was the first person to injure himself on that particular piece of coast—I know that my hon. Friend represents a constituency which, at one time at least, was on the coast; part of it may still be on the coast.

The photographer sued the local authority for not having put up warning notices. He was the first person in 90 years to fall in the sea and then receive damages against the local authority, which has now had to go to the expense of putting up notices.

Does my hon. Friend accept that no-risk compensation —the idea that any risk, however minimal, must be guarded against and that the failure so to do renders one liable in the courts and under the HSE—is a widespread problem and needs a widespread response?

Mrs. Lait: I most certainly accept that. I am sure that many of us could think of many other similar instances. We need to look at the whole body of regulation in that area.

I shall refer again to Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution because an issue that arises time and again goes under the glamorous title of BATNEEC—best available technology not entailing excessive cost. BATNEEC has led to endless arguments between HMIP, which tends to be in the middle, the DOE, the DTI and various other regulatory bodies and companies. I understand that HMIP has now provided a definition that is acceptable to all those bodies. That means that, at long last, some of that grey area which has produced so much argument may be resolved, and that will help in the whole of the deregulation issue.

There is still one remaining worry that business people have about HSE, HMIP and even—dare I say it—that other body, the environmental health officers.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; earlier, I vowed not to intervene at any point in her speech. For a long time, I have been conducting a campaign against acronyms. My hon. Friend has used probably a dozen completely incomprehensible acronyms in the past five minutes. Her speech is excellent and fascinating, but may I, even at this late stage, ask her to join my campaign against acronyms?

Mrs. Lait: The suggestion that we have a campaign against acronyms is sensible. However, I must tell my hon. Friend that when one is trying to say "best available technology not entailing excessive cost", BATNEEC comes more readily to the tongue.

Mr. Sainsbury: Perhaps I may remind my hon. Friend that if our hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) were to launch a campaign against acronyms, he would be taking on not only the DOE but the whole Government as well. He might recall that when my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) moved from the Government Whips Office to the MOD, he said that he had moved from anonymity to acronymity.

Mrs. Lait: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right.

I shall return to my previous remarks. One of the worries that business people have is the need to ensure that within that collection of acronyms there are people who have a business background, as well as technical and scientific experts who are required for that sort of job, because often the bottom line is affected by the decisions of those acronyms. We need to ensure that there are sensible negotiating stances, not the well-known stamping of the foot and companies being told that they will be closed within 24 hours if they do not do it.

I shall move on to a different area: business-friendly finance. I have no intention whatever of mentioning the clearing banks, although I am sure that some hon. Members may wish to do so. If I started on the clearing banks, I am sure that I would go on for even longer.

The White Paper had great difficulty dealing with late payment. I understand why from the reactions to the proposals that it came up with. The Forum of Private Business asked, "How dare the White Paper not propose legislation?", but the Confederation of British Industry and the Federation of Small Businesses both welcomed the fact that we have not done so. Those are the three principal organisations affecting small businesses, so I have enormous sympathy for the stance that we have taken in the White Paper.

It is sensible to require that particularly large companies, which publish their accounts, include in their annual report and accounts a statement of their payment policy. That would at least put on some psychological pressure and give smaller businesses a handle on how to get some movement on payment.

It is not merely a question of companies, as the Government should also be setting an example. Unfortunately, I know of two cases in my constituency in which the Government have conspicuously not done so. One case involves one of those silent companies that do so well and which we all notice only when something goes wrong. It maintains all the clocks in the royal palaces and that includes Big Ben—we all know when that goes wrong.

During the past 10 years, the company's contract has been with a variety of different forms of the Property Services Agency and therein lies the problem, because, as we are all aware, there have been great changes in the agency during that time. The company's bills were sent to addresses that were vacated, and to people who had left or moved and a very large sum of money was outstanding.

The company is small and, eventually, through the use of solicitors, it persuaded whoever was finally in charge to pay the bills. What he or she was not prepared to do, however, was pay for the cost of financing the money that the company had not received, which in many cases dated right back to 1982. The company has had to lay people off, largely because it needed to fund the bills that had not been paid. I very much hope that, as I have alerted my right hon. Friends the Minister for Industry and the Environment Minister, something will be done about that.

To move to a slightly happier note, another company in my constituency called Photek— a small, high-tech company, involved in image intensifier technology—has been helped enormously during the past few years by Government and European grants, under the SMART and Eureka awards. Originally, when its bills were submitted against invoices, under the system as laid down, it was paid within one month, but it now finds that it is taking one month for the Government to write a cheque. I urge the Department of Trade and Industry, which is responsible for dispersing the money, to look again at its systems because it causes difficulties for small companies' cash flows if they do not receive their grant cheques as they should.

Finance for small business is an issue which has long concerned many of us and we all await the Treasury report. One of the greatest problems, which I come up against time and again, is the need for venture capital of up to £500,000 for companies. With our latest suggestion in the Budget —the Venture Capital Trust—and other encouragements, we are beginning to deal with that problem. We cannot just rely on business angels, however.

I have regularly heard the line about how one can make a small fortune—start with a large one and go into venture capital. I have sympathy with that view, because I know people who have suffered in that way. We need a culture change. Companies must get away from always looking to overdraft finance. We must change to long-term investment, equity stakes and even to preference shares, which do not dilute an owner's ownership of a company.

There is also an opportunity for the private sector to come in, as it has done so well in the past, through small investment trusts, enabling any member of the public to take a stake in venture capital—investment trusts designed to invest in businesses needing up to £500,000. We all know why it is so difficult, because the costs of finding venture capital are very high, but something like an investment trust would reduce that cost.

It is a matter of interest that 3Is is at long last coming to the market. It was set up by the clearing banks to avoid being nationalised in 1948 and has proved to be their greatest investment. It has done a tremendous job in providing venture capital.

That brings me to the contentious subject of dividends being too high. I tend to believe that one of the closest things that we have to a sensible market is in the City. We have had an unstable economic background for three decades, with high inflation, high interest rates. One has never known which way the economy is going, or whether taxes will go up or down. Some of us remember the 1970s, when we had Budgets fairly regularly. The noble Lord Healey was known for multiple Budgets in the way that other people run multiple stores.

We now have a regime that enables us to see clearly our future for the next few years. We set out in the Budget a very clear statement, which the Chancellor reiterated a couple of days ago, of Government policy and the intention to keep inflation and interest rates low and to set out a tax regime. That will bring the stability that is required for a more sensible longer-term view in the City markets. Quite rightly, as they have not known what would happen to the economy in the next one, two or three years, they have looked for a higher return for high risk. One asks for short pay-back terms on investment. Investors rightly want a high return for that risk.

We have had a high dividend regime, but, equally, United Kingdom companies have been used to going to the City to get investment. The success of those requests has a direct relationship to the success of the business, its management skills and ability and its profitability. We must try very hard to get over the message that stability is the key to ensuring long-term, worthwhile investments, which will ensure a growing and competitive economy in the long run.

Briefly, on the role of the City, which I promised to mention, the key to success has much to do with the skills that it has developed and even more to do with the fact that it sits on Greenwich mean time and hence can deal throughout the world during its working day. Even if we move to European time, with the extra hour, that power will remain. We also have the English language, which is the international language of business. Because of those advantages, we have developed a range of business and financial skills that is not apparent in other European countries.

We are continually being challenged that Frankfurt and Paris will take over from us in Europe. One has only to study the financial structures of those two countries to realise that they do not have the wide range of skills required in the global market. Hence, as long as we remain flexible and the regulators in the City do not become too rigid, we will remain pre-eminent. We must not be complacent, but we will remain pre-eminent in world financial skills, which will keep up our competitiveness.

We are still the second-biggest investor abroad. Our surplus in 1992 was £8.3 billion, and that must be good for all of our pensioners and for everybody who has a stake in businesses. Sensible businesses are obviously investing abroad, and hence we are bringing money back into this country at a much greater rate than that at which other countries are investing in us; their outflows are smaller than the inflows into the United Kingdom.

We need to ensure that because of longer-term financial stability, companies will increase their research and development, and that is crucial for our continuing competitiveness. It was with great pleasure that I read today that, practically for the first time ever, British companies are investing in research and development at four times the international rate. Long may it continue. I hope very much that that is a reflection of the creation by the Government of the long-term stable economy which we are all looking for.

It also helps companies to export, and many of the things that I have described lead in the long run to better exporting. The Department of Trade and Industry has done a tremendous job with its export promoters. I chair a committee which is very involved in west Africa, and a year ago it was in the doldrums about the help which it was getting from the Government in terms of exporting. Now, in so far as business men are ever lyrical, they are lyrical about the help they are getting. I know that the response is not just coming in west Africa, and I commend the DTI for that.

It is encouraging going round companies—as I do in my constituency—and seeing the percentage of their products that are going to export. It is no longer uncommon for 85 per cent. of production to be exported, and not necessarily just to the Community. I do wish that we would stop talking about exporting to the Community—we are one single market.

Finally—the House may be glad to know—I would just like to examine the role of infrastructure in our competitiveness. Some hon. Members may have seen today the report by the Henley Centre which says that the area around Cambridge and the east midlands will have the greatest growth in the coming decade. One of the keys to that growth, the report says, is easy communication. I could not agree more.

The need for good roads is crucial to this country and we must ensure that we invest wisely and quickly in areas where we do not have good roads at the moment. It is crucial for our economic development, and I say that as someone who has pleaded loud and long for investment in two principal roads into and out of my constituency—the A259 and the A21. There is a direct correlation between the fact that we have only just got below 13 per cent. unemployment, the quality of our roads and our weak economy. I should like the Department of Transport to move to a system of recognising the economic development potential of roads, rather than a straight mathematical calculation on growth based on the current economy.

I am conscious that I have not covered all of the issues in the White Paper, but I never said that I would. I am beginning to run out of puff, and I should just like to draw my remarks to a close.

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): One of the areas of the White Paper to which the hon. Lady has not made much reference is the question of discrimination. I note that the White Paper says that unfair discrimination in the labour market is

[Mr. John Austin-Walker]

"morally wrong and economically damaging".

Will she prevail upon her colleagues not to continue the filibuster this morning, so that we can discuss the rights of disabled people and their opportunities to enter the labour market?

Mrs. Lait: I am fascinated that the hon. Gentleman wishes me to continue to discuss the White Paper, which I should be happy to do. I am equally conscious that a large number of hon. Members want to discuss other parts of it, and it is only fair that I should draw my remarks to a close. I commend the White Paper and my motion to the House, and I commend also the long-term policy of the Government of introducing flexibility into our economy and producing economic stability. The need for us as a nation is to rejoice in change, and not to resist change. That is the key to continual competitiveness.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), both on her good fortune and on her choice of subject. When the hon. Lady was the Conservative candidate for Wallsend—a constituency close to my own —I said at the time, "This lady will go far." Of course, in going to Hastings and Rye she has gone about as far as she reasonably could.

Mrs. Lait: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman's speech so early on, but it is only fair to say for the record that it was not Wallsend—it was Tyne Bridge.

Mr. Cousins: That is even closer to my constituency, and hence even further for the hon. Lady to go.

I knew the hon. Lady's predecessor—Sir Kenneth Warren as he now is—extremely well. I served on the Select Committee on Trade and Industry with him, and he was in many respects a remarkable man with many fine qualities. One of those fine qualities was arguing convincingly that Indonesian food did not have to taste exclusively of peanuts. It is of course such small, but important, discoveries that make our life in this House so rich and rewarding.In one respect, however, the hon. Lady is very different from her predecessor. I say this with no disrespect to Sir Kenneth Warren, but I could not visualise him speaking for over an hour on a Friday morning.

The subject is, of course, extremely important, and I agree with much of the hon. Lady's analysis—although sadly very few of her conclusions. She alluded in her own way to the point at which our approach to these matters should begin, and I share her opinion about that: we must work with the idea that no one in the world owes anyone in this country a living. Any cronyism, complacency, the old person network—[Interruption.] I appear to have said something entertaining. I am delighted to think that, at such an early point on a Friday morning, I can give rise to such amusement. I repeat the phrase which I think caused the excitement—"the old person network". The "steady as we go" and "It'll be all right on the night" spirit are part of the "back to basics" of very many people in the British economy.

Mr. Butler: I am terribly grateful to the hon. Gentleperson for giving way. Does the hon. Gentleperson not realise quite how silly phrases such as "old person network" sound?

Mr. Cousins: As we discover on these occasions, such remarks are intended to give rise to even greater silliness in others. I appear to have achieved my objective in that respect.

Every British institution and enterprise is being tested in the global challenge—including, I may say, this one. This House's ability to discuss matters that are important to many of our people is being challenged and, on some occasions, we do not succeed in seeing those matters through to their conclusion as we should. Such matters are important in a discussion of global challenges, and the way in which banks conduct themselves and the kind of research and development expenditure that we have are fundamental to that challenge. I am sorry that the hon. Lady did not respond as promised to an intervention in which I drew her attention to the disturbing report about the rundown of the City of London. It is, after all, the base for much of our financial information and high-technology services.

Every time the hon. Lady was confronted with such institutional issues, she fell back to using the oldest trick, by arguing, "On the one hand this, but on the other hand that." That was her approach to late payment, to research and development, to the evolution of our company structures and, I am afraid, to much else in her speech.

The truth is that there is no point in any of us looking back to the 1960s, the 1970s or the 1980s because every one of those decades was a period of relative failure according to some crucial necessary indicator of economic success. Any political party that plays a party game of statistical charades and dresses things up to make relative failure look like absolute success will fail: people will no longer be fooled by such behaviour. Sadly, many of our people expect us to try to fool them. If we are to correct that impression, we must start by not fooling ourselves.

The hon. Lady spoke about the search for stable macro-economic conditions and, although she may have focused too closely on it, I accept that it is important. In the 1980s, we experienced swings from boom to bust. Such experience should guide us on what to avoid in the future and I appreciate that the Government are trying to learn that lesson in their own way. We must avoid reproducing the stop-go economies of the past. The Government's adoption of a multi-speed, multi-track approach to the indicators governing the economic cycle will not do.

At each end of the punt, poling furiously in opposite directions, we have the Chancellor, who is, for the moment, preaching fiscal rectitude, and the Governor of the Bank of England, who has allowed monetary laxity. Each of them is still promising the other that, in some further eddy in the economic cycle, they will change places.

Stability is not achieved by setting all the signals at amber and hoping that the trains will not hit each other. Such a strategy will not produce stability; it is simply a posture of informed indifference and neglect. I fear that that represents the macro-economic policy of this Government.

Neither the White Paper nor any other item of Government policy addresses some of the fundamental structural deficiencies in the British economy. We do not undertake enough research. We do not draw enough upon the skills and enterprise of every part of our society and every region of our country. We are not sufficiently well trained and our skill levels are not high enough, although I accept that a minority of our population is extremely skilful and well trained. Our investment levels are not large enough, not financed soundly enough and not targeted on the right kind of object. The Government have not addressed those fundamental institutional and supply-side deficiencies. The White Paper merely refers to them as a signal of past failure and indifference and does not offer any real promise of a change of heart.

Mr. Butler: The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that policy is not directed at the correct projects and sectors, but has failed to answer the question, "Who should do the targeting?" Is he suggesting a return to Government targeting—the National Economic Development Office, NEDO and so on—or does he have some other proposal?

Mr. Cousins: All the stakeholders in any enterprise must be involved to a far greater extent, because currently too few of them are involved in serious discussions on the future of their enterprise. One of the major deficiencies of the market in corporate performance is the lack of involvement of some of the major institutional shareholders and financiers; they simply do not engage in a continuing evaluation of companies and their activities. They do not engage in forward looks, to use the Government's phrase, at their investments. "Forward look" is a good phrase, although I do not believe that the result of the effort is that promising.

I deliberately use the term "stakeholder" here because more is involved than the shareholders. It is important to discover who are the stakeholders—the legitimate social partners—because their lack of involvement underpins one of the fundamental deficiencies in the Government's analysis of our problems.

Mr. Butler: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his response to my question. Do I take it that he is not proposing any form of NEDO, albeit known by another set of acronyms or title? Does that mean that the old Labour party idea of Government centrally controlled investment planning and targeting, to use the hon. Member's expression, will not be proposed by him or by any future leader of the Labour party?

Mr. Cousins: There is no point in talking about reinventing NEDO, which the Government abolished. It is significant, however, that part of the current work of the Department of Trade and Industry has led to the surreptitious re-creation of many of the sectoral procedures and devices adopted by NEDO. That was exactly the format adopted by NEDO when it got down to business through its sector working parties. In effect, the DTI has re-created that sector working approach. We should not be too bugged about institutional structures, because what the Government have taken away with one hand they have partially reinvented with the other.

It is important to note, however, that the Government have failed to involve all the social partners who were involved in the work of NEDO. It is a pity that although the DTI has re-created the sector working approach it has not involved some of the stakeholders. Sadly, those people have been missed out and I suspect that that is deliberate policy.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): Is the hon. Member suggesting that politicians and civil servants can spot winners whereas the market and industrialists cannot?

Mr. Cousins: In the 1980s, we saw the manufacture of losers across all sectors of industry and we must seek to avoid that in the future.

The argument about picking winners is an argument from the past, because what we see around us is the creation of losers. I acknowledge that, to some extent, the White Paper recognised that, because it recommends ways in which the Government can work to try to prevent it from happening again. We should all agree about the importance of such work.

Mr. Sykes: When the hon. Member talks about social partners, is he talking about trade unions? If he is, what kind of social partners does he think they were to the economy in the 1970s?

Mr. Cousins: As I said at the beginning of my speech, we cannot proceed to operate a system in which many people are excluded from decision making simply because of some antique stereotype that some other people claim still exists. That is a lesson which my own party has had to learn in its own way and it is a lesson which I commend the Conservative party to learn in its own way. If we are serious about meeting global challenges, we cannot operate on the basis that some people who represent an important interest should be excluded from decision making. We must operate on the basis of partnership.

Mr. Sykes: In that case, will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to condemn the antique and outmoded strike that took place on Wednesday?

Mr. Cousins: As we all now know, Wednesday's strike was a deliberate result of secondary action by the Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] Every commuter in the south-east of England and everywhere else in the country knows it. Just as in the past we sometimes went wrong when we had open caucuses and tea and sandwiches in 10 Downing street, so we should seek to discourage operating by secondary action—nods and winks from senior Ministers on how managers faced with managerial responsibility should behave towards their work force. Let us put things clearly on the table.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman said that every commuter in the south-east knew that Government action caused the strike. He may like to tell that to Mrs. Jo Franks who, when she heard that my Chiltern train line would run throughout the strike, said:

> "I wasn't sure whether to believe it at first but I am very grateful. I would just like to thank these people for letting me get to work."

Mr. Cousins: I should be happy to talk to Mrs. Franks, presumably of Amersham or Chesham. Indeed, we intend to do so because, sadly, despite our victory last Thursday, the refreshing new democratic socialism that will take Britain to success at the end of the century has not reached some parts of the country. We have still to convince the Cotswolds and some of those Tory heartlands of their error. Rest assured that we intend to do so. On the evidence of the last European elections, we are well on our way to success. A party that comes third in a constituency like Eastleigh must take stock of its position in its own heartlands.

Mr. Butler: May I preface my remarks by saying that Chesham and Amersham are nowhere near the Cotswolds. As the hon. Gentleman travels further south, he will find that out. He may be assisted in his tentative approach towards expressing a view from the Labour Front Bench about the rail strike. I would encourage that, as attempts to get a view from the leadership contenders, apart from the hon. Gentleman, have been unsuccessful. Is he saying that a Government who state clearly, as this Government have repeatedly done, that wage settlements grossly in excess of the inflation rate are not good for industry or the country generally are interfering? And is the hon. Gentleman tentatively groping towards saying that, with inflation at 2.6 per cent. and holding, an 11 per cent. wage increase is perfectly reasonable?

Mr. Cousins: If that is a criticism—[Interruption.] As the question is addressed to me, I shall take it as such. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North (Mr. Butler) thought that I was being tentative because I thought that I was simply being gentle. One should not draw a distinction between gentleness and tentativeness. I thought that I was extremely clear in my reaction towards the entirely unnecessary rail dispute which the Government managed to engineer this week.

Mr. Butler: Jimmy Knapp is not a member of the Government—yet.

Mr. Cousins: Jimmy Knapp will end this matter as a hero, in the Chilterns and the Cotswolds and in many parts of the country where, owing to the Government's action, people can no longer travel by train. As a result of their policies, in some parts of the country people will cease to go by train in the future—or, if they do, it will be at a much higher price.

On the question of wage settlements, the 1980s taken as a whole was a period without precedent in British history when earnings constantly exceeded inflation by a factor of between 60 and 100 per cent. That occurred at all points of the trade cycle and in all aspects of the labour market condition. It was a permanent feature of the 1980s. If that is a problem for the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East—I understand that some people might regard it as a problem, although I do not see it as such—he should take the matter up with the Government because it has been a central feature of the British economic experience of the 1980s.

There was just one three-month period in the whole of the 1980s when earnings increases fell below price increases. Strangely, that three-month period coincided with the period that led to the dismissal, by her own party, of the former Prime Minister, Baroness Thatcher—an interesting coincidence which may throw some light on Conservative Governments' earnings policies.

Mr. Trend: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, during the 1980s, many of the wage increases were accompanied by increased productivity and output and were genuinely earned in that way for the first time for many generations? What this country needs is a high-wage, high-skill, high-productivity and high-output economy, not, as he seems to suggest, a low-wage economy.

Mr. Cousins: I was responding to the point put to me. If the experience of the 1980s, when wages rose roughly twice as fast as prices, is fine, then let us not argue about it.

Mr. Butler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cousins: The hon. Gentleman is back again.

Mr. Butler: I must correct the hon. Gentleman, as he has not responded to the point that I made. It is right that I should give him another opportunity to do so. Does he think that a wage claim of 11 per cent. when inflation is running at 2.6 per cent. and holding is reasonable?

Mr. Cousins: I find it slightly surprising that a Government say that we should not pick winners and intervene in industry. That matter should be freely negotiated between employers and employees. That is not a matter on which politicians should strike a position. It is a matter of considerable regret that the secretive arm tugging that went on prior to the dispute this week brought that about when the process of negotiation was clearly signalled and was on course for an outcome satisfactory to both parties.

Mr. Sainsbury: This is an important point. I take it from what the hon. Gentleman is saying, on behalf of the Labour party, that he does not think that any Government, of whatever party, should take a view on the appropriate level of growth in earnings in relation to the rate of inflation. Is he saying that, although the Government are an employer and finance employers through the tax system, they should be totally disinterested in the level of wages paid and in wage claims?

Mr. Cousins: The Government should certainly not run secretive incomes policies operated in a random and arbitrary way and produce the kind of disputes that we have had this week. I remind the Minister that we are here to discuss competitive industry. I hope that he will forgive me if I move on to more substantive aspects. We are dealing with the "classic" Cola of the problems of industry and should move on to discuss the Pepsi Cola.

Mr. Sykes: Before we move away from the subject of wages, which is an integral part of running industry and therefore greatly concerned with competitiveness, will the hon. Gentleman say whether, if he were offered an 11 per cent. increase in his wage, he would accept or decline it?

Mr. Cousins: The hon. Gentleman must realise that we are not here to debate the rail dispute that occurred this week, or the way that the Government engineered it. That, I am afraid, is clearly on the record. Perhaps we may move on to the subject of our debate now, Madam Deputy Speaker, and discuss the issues before us. Conservative Members seem to want to speak about everything apart from the matter that the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye chose as the centrepiece of the debate.

One of the key things that the Government can do is to act as a good negotiator for British industry in foreign discussions. I hope that the Minister will tell us about the negotiations that are going on in relation to access to the American telecommunications markets. I hope that he will tell us how the Government sought to support British Telecom in its arrangements with the American company MCI to gain regulatory access to the American markets for telecommunication services. I hope that he will also explain the Government's reaction to the objections that are being made by French and German telecommunications operators to that agreement, and tell us what steps he is taking to ensure that our telecommunications systems operators have full and free access to French and German markets.

That is a critical area for the development of British industry in which the Government have the ability to negotiate on behalf of British companies and British enterprise, in which, as far as we are aware from the outside, no such effective negotiation has taken place. The Government have not stood behind British enterprise and the British telecommunications companies.

As recently as this morning, an important report on research and development was published—the so-called "research and development scoreboard", which emphasises so many of the difficulties that are visible in the performance of British industry. We now discover that only 13 British companies are listed in the top 200 companies on research and development indicators. If we are seriously worried about global challenges, that should cause us considerable anxiety. We also ought to be anxious about the fact that the British companies that did appear in the list had half the commitment, in terms of the relationship of their turnover to R and D, to the other 187. Those are very significant indicators.

Mr. Trend: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that subject?

Mr. Cousins: I should like to continue and complete my argument.

Those are significant indicators of a failure to perform adequately in the key area of research and development.

We have already alluded to the debate about the retention of dividends and the attitude of the stock market and banks to large dividend pay-outs. That is clearly demonstrated in that research and development scoreboard. The commitment of 187 of those 200 companies—that is, not the British ones—is that they invest in research and development more than 100 per cent. of their pre-tax profits and almost three times the amount of their dividend pay-outs. The 13 British companies that appear in the list contribute to their research and development 29 per cent. of their pre-tax profits and only 72 per cent. of their dividend pay-outs.

That is a clear signal that the financial markets, which measure corporate performance in this country, are not working to encourage research and development in the way that those same markets work in countries that compete with us. That should give rise to considerable anxiety. Business enterprises' commitment to research and development as a share of GDP in this country decreased during the 1980s and we are alone among the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in that respect. That should cause considerable anxiety not only about our performance now but about our prospects.

Mr. Trend: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although we are all disappointed at the low percentage of money that is put into research and development, the picture in the past couple of years, especially through the past recession, has been much better than it was in the past —that companies have become aware of the importance of R and D and that they are putting more money into R and D? It is a low base, but it is an increasing base and it is good news for the future. That should be emphasised.

Many of the industrialists who gave evidence to the Trade and Industry Select Committee said that the thing that would most encourage them to put more money into research and development with a long-term view was a stable economic base. I believe that that is what the Government have now produced for industry.

Mr. Cousins: Let me answer that argument directly.

I infer from the hon. Gentleman's intervention that he is, in that respect, a Dorrellite, not a Portillo-ite. One of the attractions of the present Government and of the great supermarket of alternative policies on which we can draw is that the Opposition cannot pick the winners. That would not be an appropriate thing for us to do. Who can say whether Dorrellism or Portillo-ism will ultimately be the winner, but at any rate those alternative policies are set out for us and I commend the hon. Gentleman for taking up his position as a Dorrellite rather than a Portillo-ite in that regard.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way briefly on that subject?

Mr. Cousins: It must be very brief.

Sir Michael Grylls: I am grateful, because I know that the hon. Gentleman has been generous in giving way. He referred to dividend policy. Is he saying that it is the Opposition's policy to legislate to restrain dividends? If not, what is he proposing?

Mr. Cousins: I shall discuss that point directly.

One of the indicators of success that is mentioned in the White Paper on competitiveness—the Opposition agree with the Government's Department of Trade and Industry team that it is a true indicator of economic success—is the increasing share of business turnover that is going into investment. That process began at the depths of the recession, which is interesting. As people could not rely on their finances, businesses began to go for organic growth from their turnover and profits.

That is obviously the way forward, but if we are to sustain that development and if it is to become the way that we envisage British industry growing—I am delighted to know that there is more than one Dorrellite on the Conservative Benches this morning—we must tackle some of the key features of the way in which British industry is governed and financed. In five years of the 1980s, the banks put more into commercial property development than they put into manufacturing industry in 15 years. We must correct that. It cannot be corrected by legislation. It can be corrected by Government and others, through the social partners and by creating a culture of investment and growth in enterprise. It cannot be achieved by Government alone and it cannot be achieved by legislation, but the Government are a key player in changing the psychological climate and the investment culture in this country. The Government cannot duck their responsibilities in that respect.

If that is to be done, the stakeholders must understand what is happening. There must be a different relationship of banks to enterprise and of shareholders to enterprise —especially the big institutional shareholders, whose growth has been such a significant feature of the 1980s because of the development of pension funds and other financial instruments. One of the most curious features of the entire period of Conservative Government is that the influence of individual shareholders in companies and the proportion of shares that they control have steadily decreased. The fact that their numbers have increased should not disguise the fact that the influence that they exercise and the proportion of the equity that they control have gone steadily down.

The key relationship that has come about, therefore, in measuring the performance of the enterprise, in directing its strategy and in informing the way in which it seeks to grow, is the relationship between the big institutional shareholders and the company board. That cannot and should not be controlled by legislation, but it is something to which the Government can give a steer and a guide through the creation of the right kind of culture. It would certainly be our intention, through corporate governance changes and changes in financing arrangements, by sending signals and perhaps through the tax system—we should look at that—to change that culture and get that relationship right.

I go further than that. If we want to business investment itself to grow as a share of its turnover, the staff of the enterprise must also be fully informed and fully engaged and must fully understand what is going on. That is where the present Government's policy—of not putting an emphasis on social partnership and seeking to opt out of the European works councils arrangement and aspects of the social charter, which bring those social partners together—is undermining the basis for some of the indicators which we could agree are significant signals of a change in our economic culture and an improvement in our economic performance.

The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye gave an example of a company in her constituency—Philips. Philips would have gone down in Britain. It was saved in the Netherlands, because it had the advantage of Dutch company law and the strong stakeholder involvement in which the non-shareholding stakeholders were able to pick it up and turn it around. The hon. Lady should recognise that. She should recognise, too, the absurdity of the fact that Philips's European workers work through works councils, yet the British Government are trying to prevent its British workers from working through works councils. That is absurd and runs contrary to the whole idea of social partnership and of stakeholders sharing in decision making, which is the foundation of our future economic success.

Mr. Butler: Is not the hon. Gentleman ignoring the facts? When the decisions that led Philips to the brink of imminent collapse were made, those same stakeholders were also involved in those decisions. The same Dutch company law and commercial law informed those same decisions. Nothing changed. There was not a miraculous change whereby the stakeholders suddenly became involved and the company was saved. They were equally involved in the decisions that almost led to its collapse.

Mr. Cousins: It was the structure of Dutch company law that enabled that company to be rescued from a situation in which one of the key networks of shareholders, who, historically, had controlled the company, had made some key errors in terms of investment direction. It was the Dutch structure of company law that enabled that company to be turned around. If that company had been in Britain, it would have been taken over or would have gone down.

We learnt the this week that Scrabble, one of our sports, leisure, cultural, service-type contributions to the global market—and a very successful one—is about to fall into non-British ownership. What kind of country are we becoming if we cannot retain the ownership of Scrabble? A reform of stakeholder relationships to some of the key indicators is at the heart of our own policy of winning for Britain, and a reflection of that, albeit a pale one, can be found in the White Paper itself, and in some of the indicators that are chosen as the ones that we should adopt.

I am conscious of the time and have no desire to speak for as long as the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye, but let me state briefly some of the key areas to which I have alluded, and summarise them as being some of the key ways in which we see British competitiveness being built up. We must look at the workings of the financial system and the way in which it services British industry. We must look at the way in which companies are controlled and run, because in those corporate governance relationships are to be found the foundations of high levels of invest-and-grow policies and strategies to be adopted by British enterprises.

We must look at our performance in research and development in technology. There is some recovery there. We welcome it, but it starts from a terrifyingly low and narrow base. It cannot be right that, as regards our performance in research and development, we rely on one industry, and one alone—pharmaceuticals. The performance of that industry is brilliant and impressive. It is one of the great hopes for our future, but we cannot rely on superb performances in terms of invest-and-grow policies simply in one tiny part of the British economy and in one narrow sector of British industry. That performance must be diffused across the whole of our manufacturing industry.

We must do more about small business. That is another issue on which, when confronted with it, the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye said, "On the one hand this, and on the other hand that." The payment of interest on debt is a key way in which the Government can signal their support for small business. Surely the Government do not have to be told about the power of price signals. Putting a price signal into good payment practice is one clear way in which the Government can assist small business.

We have seen a growth of small enterprises in this country. We should all welcome that and build on it. But the wastage rate of innovation and start-up is staggering and tragic. Since 1979, this country has grown some 900,000 small businesses. We welcome that. But those small businesses have been starting up at the rate of almost half a million a year. Even if we take into account the fact that some of them are very small, the wastage rate, which is represented by the generation of half a million businesses a year, and the survival of only 900,000 in net growth after 15 years, represents human tragedy on a massive scale and the disruption of millions of people's lives. We must find ways in which small business not only comes into existence but is aided to stay in existence. A lowering of that terrifying weight of wastage is a one key way in which we can help our economy to grow.

In talking about competitiveness, there was one issue that the hon. Lady always ducked—social partnerships and social cohesion. We shall look carefully at the speeches that follow, however many there may be, because to talk about competitiveness and not talk about social partnerships and social cohesion is an enormous error. An economy will not grow unless every one of our people feels part of its growth and feels committed to and involved with its growth. No matter whether people are considering starting an enterprise, where they should be in the labour market or whether they should stay with their enterprise or move to another one, they should always feel a part of it. They should always feel fully involved and, committed to its success and to its performance. We should not shy away from that.

It must be a source of great anxiety to all of us that so many of our people are poorly educated, poorly trained, poorly motivated and are low achievers—not just at school, but in the labour market as well. It is worrying that many parts of our society are underachieving. We are not realising the full potential of our people. The building of social cohesion and a true partnership are key conditions for our economic success. Let us admit that there are too many spectacular examples of Roger Levitts and Oskar Botnars sending wrong signals to many of our people about the real nature of success and enterprise and performance.

It would be sad if in talking about competitiveness we were debating a concept that engaged the enthusiasm of only some of our people. In such a debate, we must also reach out to the "invisible" people who are entering internal exile. An extraordinary feature of the present economic indicators is that not only unemployment but employment is falling. Hundreds of thousands of our people are disappearing from the statistics into a form of internal exile. Those of us who represent tough areas know that those people are there. They are the giro drops, the panhandlers and the hustlers. That should also cause concern.

Let us build competitiveness but not attempt to deny the global challenge to which the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye referred and which lies in front of us all. Let us also say that all our people and our entire work force should be engaged in that and that they should take pride and pleasure in our future economic success.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful to have an opportunity to speak in the debate. I have not the slightest intention of speaking for as long as the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), who spoke for some 46 minutes. In view of earlier interventions, I find that rather surprising. I shall return to the subject of the hon. Gentleman's speech.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on her good luck, which we all envy, in winning the ballot and on her initiative in choosing this vital subject for debate. I also congratulate her on her excellent speech, which I am able to criticise in only one respect—her use of a large number of acronyms. My speech will be brief and I must now try to make sure that it is totally acronym free. That may be easier said than done.

I listened with great interest to the lengthy speech by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. As is often the case with Opposition speeches, most of it was negative in tone and depressing in outlook and would not have uplifted anyone inside or outside the House. It is rather sad that so much debate goes on in College Green and I have no doubt that even at this moment many people on College Green are giving sound or vision bites to television. Those who take the trouble to listen to the debates—

Mr. Martyn Jones: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's speech, but have you had any notification that the Government intend to allow time to debate the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill later today? There are six or seven Conservative Members in the Chamber, but 6.5 million people in the country are waiting for us to discuss that Bill. Have you had any notification about that?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): That is strictly not a matter for the Chair nor for the Government. These are private Member's motions. I have no ability to control the length of this debate; nor do I have any foreknowledge of how long it will take.

Mr. Austin-Walker: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have said that it was not strictly a point of order. Does the hon. Gentleman have a different point?

Mr. Austin-Walker: It relates to the fact that you referred to private Members' motions. A private Member's motion in terms similar to that which my hon. Friend wishes to move later was voted on and carried without any votes against. Can you say how that motion, which has been passed, may be given effect? It was that the House should provide time to debate the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is still not a matter for the occupant of the Chair.

Mr. Thompson: I have congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye on her choice of subject. Hon. Members in all parts of the House must agree that there is no more important subject for today's debate than competitiveness and wealth creation, which can do only good for the health service and education and other matters. None of us should feel ashamed of taking part in the debate. As I said earlier, I was struck by the time that Opposition Members appear to be taking up in a rather wasteful way. Not least in that respect was the over-lengthy speech by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. I wish to take part in the debate because of the importance of its subject.

I was struck by three aspects of the speech by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. He spoke about stability, which was also mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye. Of course stability is good, but in the same breath the hon. Gentleman referred critically to policy on Europe. That is surprising from a spokesman for a party which has had seven reversals of policy on Europe in the years that I have been involved as a parliamentary candidate or as a Member of Parliament.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman made the apparent admission that his party now has no policy on wage inflation. I was not surprised when my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye picked him up on that, and I suspect that we shall hear much more about that in the coming months. Thirdly, I am surprised at the lack of interest by Opposition Members in the debate generally.

[Mr. Thompson]

While the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central was speaking, I counted the number of Opposition Members who were obviously interested in the debate and intended to take part; judging from the attendance at the moment the number seems to be almost zero. That must be a reflection of their view of the importance of wealth creation, which we believe in and which the debate is all about because without competitiveness there is no wealth creation.

The only point on which I had any sympathy with the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central was when he struck a note similar to that struck by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye in referring to short-termism, dividends and the operation of the City. In that respect, I was in sympathy not only with my hon. Friend but with some of the implications of what was said by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. There, at least, I found interesting points that were worth further consideration.

I shall concentrate on education and training, but first I wish to refer to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye on the importance of infrastructure and roads. Any Member from Norwich must have a strong interest in communications, infrastructure and roads. Since I was first elected in 1983, I have campaigned for better road communications with Norwich and East Anglia generally.My hon. Friend is right: the Government should look at this not in terms of counting how many cars or heavy goods vehicles are using the A11, but in terms of the economic benefits to the communities involved. I am delighted to support what she said in that respect and plead with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry to speak to our Government colleagues—particularly my neighbour in Norfolk the Secretary of State for Transport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor)—who are concerned with these matters, to persuade them to continue fighting for better road communications for East Anglia. It is a credit to the Government that much has been done and that it now takes me only half the time to drive from Norwich to London that it used to take. However, there is still a long way to go to bring the network up to standard. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye gave me an opening which I have taken to make a constituency and local point.

Better competitive performance is essential for our success in the European Union, in which there is no alternative to co-operation. We tended not to notice the recent vote in Austria because we were busy with our own elections, but in that referendum there was a 66 per cent. yes vote and the turnout was more than 80 per cent. That was encouraging and showed that Austria was not fooled by the wilder claims of the extreme right and others in that country. I gather that older people were predominant in supporting Austria's membership of the European Union. I do not know whether that had anything to do with the old person network to which the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central referred, but I found that an interesting point.

The approach of the White Paper on competitiveness is welcome and I congratulate Ministers on the work that they put into it and on the good message that it gives. The long-standing gap between our education and training performance and that of our competitors has long been recognised. The good news about the White Paper is that it has addressed the problem again and, I think, more vigorously than before. Thanks to the policies and actions of the Government, the gap is closing, but it must be eliminated altogether. It is not tolerable that there should be any gap between our performance in education and training and that of our competitors in Europe or elsewhere.

I welcome in particular the streamlined approach to the national curriculum, on which Ofsted—I have used an acronym, which has woken everyone up, but time or my memory does not permit me to give its full title—recently gave evidence to the Select Committee. According to that splendid organisation, standards have been raised in achievement and motivation, which must be due to the dedication of our teachers and the support of parents in the education system.

The White Paper is correct to concentrate on strengthening the vocational element of the last years of secondary education. I particularly welcome the new general diploma and its emphasis on mathematics, science and languages—the key subjects for our young people, whatever future careers they pursue. Britain cannot afford to have its young people less qualified than those in Germany, Japan or elsewhere. I heard at a recent Industry and Parliament Trust conference in the House that some of our industrialists are saying that it may be more worth while to employ a German boy who is well qualified vocationally and in engineering and to teach him English than to employ an English boy and give him the necessary technical skills. I hope that that is not true, but if it is, I hope that it will give the Government further encouragement to do more than they are doing at present on vocational and technical training.

I welcome the additional support and training for careers teachers. That is another important matter which I do not have much time to deal with in a shortish speech. The Government have been wise to provide an extra £23 million to ensure that the maximum number of 15 and 16-year-olds get work experience. All of this is good. The expansion in the range of schools' contacts with the outside world is bound to have an impact also on the responsibilities of head teachers and deputy heads. The White Paper—this is perhaps the only critical note that I shall introduce—refers to a voucher scheme working from 1995-96 to help with the training of head teachers. That is good, but it does not go far enough. For many years, I have argued for a much bolder initiative—a staff college, perhaps funded through the proposed new Teacher Training Agency, dedicated to the training of heads, deputies and other senior teachers. A voucher scheme is a tiny move in that direction, but I am critical to the extent that I should like to see more. I welcome the opportunity once again to put forward that idea, which I know finds favour in many quarters.

Not many years ago, I was a member of the Education Select Committee. We visited Germany, where we saw the key contrast between the strength and quality of its technical education at secondary and apprenticeship level compared with ours. As other hon. Members have said—I do not intend to speak at length on this as time does not permit—there are differences in culture between Germany and this country from which we can still learn. Of course it works both ways: there are many things that people in Germany can learn from our culture.

The good news is that we are now introducing modern apprenticeship schemes for 16 to 17-year-olds and accelerated apprenticeships schemes for 18 to 19-year-olds, which will provide them with vocational or academic qualifications and high-quality work, leading to recognised qualifications. These are all clear steps in the right direction. The £100 million that the Government have promised is good news, but I shall be one of those hon. Members, possibly from both sides of the House, who will be pressing the Government on training and apprenticeships. I am not in favour of ever higher public spending, but when considering priorities I would favour pushing training and apprenticeships higher up the list of priorities, and I suspect that Opposition spokesmen would not disagree with that sentiment.

The reaction of manufacturing and engineering companies and education and training bodies to the proposals on education and training in the White Paper has been very favourable. This is all good news. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood), who has taken up his place on the Front Bench, will pass on to Ministers my welcome for the competitiveness White Paper and the opportunity to take part in the debate. Ministers must expect to be asked for more by groups interested in training, not least the all-party parliamentary group for engineering development, of which I am a member. A senior member of it—indeed, its treasurer—my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) will take part in the debate later.

The Government deserve the strong support of both sides of the House for the initiatives outlined in the White Paper and for the work that they have done.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I shall limit my remarks to manufacturing industry, particularly the car industry. Hon. Members will be aware of my involvement in the motor industry, which is at the forefront of our economic and industrial operations. That was recognised by the President of the Board of Trade in his remarks to the Industry Forum, which was set up by the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders. In deference to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), I will not give the acronym. The society, along with the Department of Trade and Industry, has established the Industry Forum. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said:

> "The automotive components industry is a major contributor to the UK's industrial performance. It plays a crucial role in the future competitiveness of our vehicle manufacturers."

I shall not continue the quote as that makes the situation pretty clear.

The motor industry is particularly relevant to this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on her excellent speech, in which she was aided by the penetrating wisdom of Conservative Members. The Employment Select Committee investigated the attractiveness to Japanese business men of investing in Britain. It was clear that there were a number of factors, such as our language, but the predominant one was our work practices. Just as we compete to sell our goods, we compete for inward investment not only from Europe but from the world. The fact that the Japanese choose to invest in Britain—whether it be to manufacture motor cars or television tubes—shows that we are competitive, but we can never be competitive enough.

My motivation to leave my job as a senior manager in the car industry and to join the House in 1979 was to help to make changes which would make us more competitive. Given our productivity, the number of strikes and our industrial attitude in 1978-79, the changes that we have made are a fantastic achievement. It is not coincidental that they have been made over the same period as I have been an hon. Member, although I do not, of course, take full credit for the changes. We were greatly aided by Lord Tebbit, as he now is, who was at the forefront in introducing changes. As his Parliamentary Private Secretary, I greatly enjoyed seeing so many changes introduced. Democracy was introduced to the trade unions and the Government have introduced sense to the work force. Nissan, Toyota and Honda are manufacturing cars in Britain, the local content of which is about 80 per cent. About 80 per cent. of their products are sold abroad. It has been said that we do not export to Europe, which is correct as it is a single market, but I am talking of exports well beyond Europe.

The three Japanese motor manufacturers have created new jobs, and the same can be said of all the other companies that have invested in the United Kingdom. They are not taking jobs away from domestic manufacturers, by and large. The jobs have been created as a result of sensible work practices. They have certainly not been created by social partnership. It is clear to me that if we signed up to the social chapter and faced increased costs—£17 billion or whatever—we would become less competitive and less attractive to inward investment at a time when we need to do everything possible to keep our costs low.

Mr. Cousins: Does the hon. Gentleman think that there is a major Japanese investor in new manufacturing plant in the United Kingdom who is not already meeting and exceeding by far any requirement of the social charter? In his patterns of social partnership and worker involvement, the Japanese investor is blazing a trail for the rest of British industry.

Mr. Mills: The hon. Gentleman has a point. The Japanese are glad to admit that where they have introduced the Japanese system ~~in our~~ country the British have taken it over and improved it. Work practices in many Japanese companies in this country may be excellent. It must be remembered, however, that they are the practices that they have chosen. The Japanese made it clear to us at chairman level—it is usually president level in Japan—and through leading members of the Japanese equivalent of the Confederation of British Industry that they do not wish to have a centralised structure imposed upon them. They do not wish to be told that they must do this or that, that the working week must be 38 hours, and so on. If they wish to exceed their working practices, that is up to them. They do not want rigidity. They want flexibility. They wish to be able to consult the work force. They refer to their employees as associates or members of the company. They wish to be able to discuss with them the best way forward. If best practice schemes are introduced, the Japanese wish to ensure that they are paid for by productivity and that the return to the company will be greater. They say, "If you want all these good things, we must increase our productivity. We cannot lose productivity." By and large, their companies have succeeded because of the Japanese culture at the workplace.

[Mr. Mills]

The reaction of our traditional domestic manufacturers—Ford, Vauxhall and Rover—has been fascinating. These companies are in or near my constituency. They have adopted Japanese work practices and then exceeded them. Their approaches have perhaps been slightly different from those followed by Japanese companies. These companies have also increased their productivity. The chairman of BMW, Mr. Pischetsrieder, talked about the reasons why his company wished to buy Rover. He explained that it was partly because of Rover's products and partly because of their quality. I asked him whether BMW wished to buy partly because of Rover's work practices and its high productivity. His answer was yes. That is the chairman of a leading car manufacturer which achieves engineering excellence. He has given Rover great credit in saying that one of the reasons for thinking that Rover would be a suitable partner in facing the tough car world of the future was its work practices, along with quality and engineering. The Conservative Government can take credit for introducing policies that have allowed good working practices to be introduced and implemented. Management has been encouraged to manage and to achieve successes.

Of course, we must never stop looking for greater productivity and greater competitiveness. The Industrial Forum of the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders is a joint approach to try to improve best practice for car component producers and car manufacturers. There is obviously a need for funding and the society is concerned because it feels that there is insufficient funding. That may be because the funding for training is channelled through training and enterprise councils. Perhaps the Department of Trade could talk to the Department of Employment about ensuring that appropriate funding—it may not have to be additional to the funds now allocated to training—is channelled more specifically to the Industrial Forum so that increased competitiveness can be continued as a result of better training. If my right hon. Friend cannot respond today, perhaps he will inform me of his views in future. The forum is seen by the car industry as a most important initiative. It would be a great shame to lose it.

I met the president of the training standards officers to discuss his concerns and those of his members. By and large, they support deregulation, and so do I, but they are concerned that local government changes leading to more unitary authorities could lead to a loss of competitiveness, bearing in mind the number of training standards that would be involved and their competitiveness. If my right hon. Friend the Minister feels that that is not a matter for his Department, perhaps he will pass it on to the appropriate Department.

Manufacturing industry and industry generally is facing competition which is not confined to our partners in the European Union or others in the western world, all of whom face a level of social employment costs which are not dissimilar. Our unit labour costs, however, are well ahead of those of our European partners. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye said, we are increasingly facing competition from the Pacific—from Taiwan, the Philippines and Indonesia. As those countries become more sophisticated, which happens rapidly as a result of access to high technology on a turnkey basis, they become more competitive because they do not have our social practices and costs. Their unit labour costs are far lower than ours, but they have access to the same technology. There is a burning need to increase our competitiveness. It is no good making comparisons with European countries or other countries in the west. In the real world, we must compete world wide in terms of both goods and services. That is why it is so important that this debate is taking place.

The car industry has shown that it is at the start of our pull out of recession. Housing starts take far too long. About 17 per cent. more cars were sold last year than previously. Fleet sales have at last started to pick up. When I attended the fleet show a few weeks ago, I was amazed by the number of people present. There was a buoyant feeling among company managers, who were about to buy the latest of the cars produced in this country. Generally, company cars are usually British cars. I welcome the partnership between BMW and Rover. I know that the intention of improving the joint company's competitiveness will give both parts of it a far better chance in the future. One element of competitiveness is having a large enough base to ensure world-class engineering. Our domestic car industry now has that base.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am delighted to be able to participate in an excellent debate. I join all those who have congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on her good fortune in securing the debate and on her good judgment in selecting this subject.

It was interesting to hear the views of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on the recent rail strike and a possible threatened rail strike. He reminded me of the old saying that when in a hole the best thing to do is to stop digging.

The almost complete lack of attenders and would-be speakers on the Labour Benches is remarkable. However, the complete absence of Members on the Liberal Democrat Benches is significant and I hope that point will not be lost on the House and the British public.

We have had some good news in my constituency over the past couple of days. The statistics show that unemployment fell in the last month by 6 per cent. Since December 1992, unemployment has fallen by more than 19 per cent. Like so many parts of the south-east, my constituency was hit extremely hard by the recession. That is one of the reasons why this debate is so timely. It is manufacturing industry which will primarily drag us quickly out of recession and promote and encourage the recovery.

Contrary to popular myth, Eastbourne has a strong light engineering and manufacturing sector as well as the obvious service and tourism sectors. The problem is that, as in so many places in the south—far more during this recession than in many parts of the north—many companies have gone out of business. It has been all too easy for politically motivated people and the people involved in those companies to blame what has happened purely and simply on the recession.

It is true that some of those businesses went out of business entirely because of the recession and the difficulties that it brought in its wake. I fear that some would have gone out of business anyway, perhaps because of the management or other faults in the company. I am sure that some went out of business because of the late payment difficulties about which we have heard, when large customers with whom those companies were doing business slowed up payments to aid their own cash flow and, as a result, brought down the smaller companies. I also have to say that some of those companies went out of business because of excessive regulation. Finally, I am convinced that some of them went out of business because of the attitude of the major clearing banks.

It is unfair to tar all the banks with the same brush. In some cases, the banks have leaned over backwards to help companies. To put it differently, in some companies the bank manager has done the owner a favour by drawing a line and bringing matters to a head instead of perhaps putting the owner's home or whatever in jeopardy.

However, there is a very strong feeling among local business men, which was revealed during a visit that I paid recently to the Eastbourne and District chamber of commerce, that the banks have not, for the most part, been helpful. People feel that the banks were far too ready to pull the rug from under companies as the recession took hold and, perhaps more relevantly, that the banks are not flexible enough with regard to new lending policy as the economy recovers.

We all know that, as an economy recovers, there is an extra danger of people going out of business, of cash flow coming under stress and of over-trading. That demands extra sensitivity from the major banks. The White Paper is particularly useful in respect of some of these matters. It makes the point that a significant proportion of total United Kingdom employment is in small and medium-sized enterprises or, to use the favoured acronym in this case, in SMEs.

With regard to international comparisons, a Bank of England report showed that overdrafts account for 56 per cent. of small firm debt in the United Kingdom compared with only 14 per cent. in Germany. That is a staggering difference.

In paragraph 9.11, the White Paper makes a point with which we are all familiar from our experience of talking to small business men and women. It states that > "many businesses do not expect overdrafts to be withdrawn and come to rely on them as permanent sources of finance. This can give rise to misunderstanding and resentment when a bank wishes to reduce its exposure. There is evidence that both banks and businesses are now beginning to place greater weight on longer term finance."

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): Does my hon. Friend agree that another worrying trend among our major clearing banks is the increasing tendency for decisions to be made at headquarters and not by the managers out in the branches who know the businesses concerned and the people behind those businesses and who are perhaps better placed to decide whether to support such a business? Increasingly, accountants at headquarters take decisions that are good for the bank's balance sheet, but perhaps very bad for the business.

Mr. Waterson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, particularly for saying almost word for word something that I was about to say a little later. However, I am grateful to him all the same.

I want to refer to two recent cases in my constituency. I spend a lot of my time, as I suspect most hon. Members do during these recessionary times, talking to small business men. A road haulier, whose business had been going for many years, came to my surgery. He told me that he had plenty of business. He wanted to expand and to buy new lorries. However, he could not even get an overdraft facility from his bank. The most that he could achieve was a chequeing facility. That is incredible for a business of that sort where cash flow is obviously very much up and down.

The second case is perhaps even more dramatic and it concerns a firm that I visited in my constituency called Channel Triline. That company was formed as a result of a management buy-out and it produces window cladding for buildings. It has been very successful following the management buy-out. It had a positive balance at the bank and a good full order book. At the end of April, that stood at almost £1 million.

Despite the difficult construction market of which we are all aware, that company had a £1 million turnover in its first year and a £2 million turnover in the second year. It had won prestigious contracts such as the London central mosque in Regent's park and the new Glyndebourne opera house just up the road from my constituency. It had also recently secured a very important order for screens and windows at a new Cadbury Schweppes factory in Poland.

That company had an enthusiastic work force and management and, as I have said, it had a very full order book. When I visited it, one of the directors looked fondly out the window at a neighbouring empty industrial unit and said that he could fill it tomorrow with men and machines. He showed me a pile of letters from every type of bank and financial institution one could imagine, and some that one perhaps could not imagine.

Clearly, the figures that the director wanted to discuss were not suitable for venture capital organisations. It is fair to say that the company received some help from the know-how fund, for which it was grateful. However, it had little or no success with the small loans guarantee scheme. I fear that that scheme is still difficult for business men to access.

My point is that that company, with its full and growing order book, with a tremendous future and, by definition, with no outstanding debt, because it had effectively bought out a business that had gone into liquidation, could not obtain any facilities, not even an overdraft facility, from its bankers. That is incredible. As a result of that, there was the notorious equity gap. The company was unable to finance its day-to-day, let alone its longer-term, financial needs. Such companies, which need finance, perhaps of £500,000 or less, have a major problem obtaining it.

In recent days, it has been announced that that company is to be put into liquidation at the behest of the directors. They have suggested that to the shareholders simply because they cannot find any finance to run the operation.

It is difficult for hon. Members to comment on relationships between business entities and their bankers —one never really knows all the facts—but there is evidence, certainly in my constituency, that the banks are very inflexible at times in dealing with companies' financial needs and that they have an effective blacklist for certain sectors, of which the construction industry is one. It mystifies me how we are ever to see a recovery in that sector if the banks simply do not want to know.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) touched on the problem of inflexibility. We have seen swathes of redundancies among older and more experienced managers in the banking system and, as a result, I fear, the average local bank manager is much more susceptible to guidelines and directives from regional or head offices.

[Mr. Waterson]

But that is not to say that there are no success stories, including some in my constituency. One of our biggest companies in Eastbourne, the Nobo Group plc, which began life in a garage when two entrepreneurs found that there was a need for notice boards in industry, is now a very successful and substantial company. One of its subsidiaries, Elite Optics Ltd., has tremendously increased the quality of its designs, and its sales abroad have increased from less than 10 per cent. three years ago to more than 50 per cent. today. As a result, it also won a much-coveted Queen's award for export in April. That company is fighting hard to compete in an ever-more competitive world. The price of the hardwood that it imports from Malaysia and which is necessary for some of its products has increased by 40 per cent. in recent times. Such companies are at the coal face of competitiveness in our country.

Another example is Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Ltd., the pharmaceutical giant, which employs 600 people in my constituency. The important point to note about that company is that it spends approximately £28 million a year on research and development in the United Kingdom and that it makes a positive contribution of £50 million net to the United Kingdom balance of payments.

A company called HMD Seal/Less Pumps is another great success story in my constituency and it is well known to the DTI, with which it has had many discussions over the years. Some 84 per cent. of its turnover is sent overseas and it is competing on at least equal terms with the Japanese and many others. It has produced advanced designs and it has had some help by means of a DTI-subsidised consultancy under the enterprise initiative scheme. That company has effectively doubled its turnover in three years, which is a tremendous achievement in a recessionary time. It has substantial exports; it has exported to 20 countries in the past year. The management are very committed; they seem to spend much of their time travelling around the world.

I appreciate that the Government have decided for the moment that they will not introduce legislation on late payment. Like most small business men, I have mixed feelings on the subject. Of course there is a problem; we all know about it. I have described how some of the companies that went out of business in the recession in my constituency did so through no fault of their own or because of the recession but because people simply became slower in making payments. On the whole, my view is still that the Government should reconsider statutory rights to interest, and so on.

There is a significant feeling among my small business men and women that it would be a matter of who would bell the cat, particularly with a large organisation or even a governmental or quasi-governmental department, and that it is all very well giving people a legal right, but whether, in commercial terms, it would make sense for them to try to enforce that right when competitors might not be willing to do so is another matter.I still have some doubts on that score.

I am conscious that time is moving on, so I shall refer only briefly to deregulation. Obviously, I have been particularly concerned about deregulation in tourism because of my constituency. I am delighted at the various steps that the Government have been taking in the deregulation initiative. The Government, as we know, have just completed the first stage of their review of 3,500 regulations affecting business—it is staggering enough to think that there are so many regulations—and more than 500 measures have been identified for action. A rolling review will continue. Deregulation will turn out to be one of the great touchstones by which the success of this Administration is judged when the history books are written.

On health and safety, there is a dynamic to reducing the number of regulations. The review recommended a reduction of 94 such regulations, including the removal of more than 40 per cent. of regulations that currently affect business in general. My hon. Friends and I very much welcome the new deregulation task force under the able chairmanship of Francis Maude. The White Paper states:

> "The Government is determined to ensure that further regulation does not place unnecessary burdens on business. Before new regulations can be introduced, business will be consulted and the costs and benefits fully addressed."

That is extremely important.

What is particularly interesting is the way in which our views on deregulation are very much in the fast lane within the European Union. Other countries, such as, particularly encouragingly, Germany, are beginning to see things from our point of view. It is important to realise that there are various reasons for over-regulation. Often, the European Union is the source of the problem, but, all too often, it is the United Kingdom gold-plating regulations when they are translated into our domestic situation. There is also over-zealous enforcement.

Also, some problems have been brought about by genuine misunderstandings either by the people who obey the regulations or by those who try to enforce them, such as environmental health officers. One example of that—I will not dwell on it—is the electricity at work regulations.

There is also the problem of under-enforcement in some European Union countries. No one will persuade me that a building inspector in Sicily, for example, approaches his job with the same rigour as a building inspector in the home counties. We must address that problem. Although I am fairly unable to be persuaded on increasing the powers of some European institutions, the strengthening of the powers of the European Court to deal with the enforcement problem are to be welcomed.

I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this important debate. I am pleased to see so many of my right hon. and hon. Friends present, but I am not surprised to see so few Opposition Members here. As I conclude my speech, the only person from any Opposition party gracing —if I may use that expression—the Chamber is the Labour spokesman, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central. It is very good to see him in such splendid isolation. I will not press him, although I am willing to accept his intervention on the rail strike or his preferences for the Labour leadership.

We owe everything to British industry. The 40 per cent. of public spending that goes on social security, our defences, our education system and all the other good things are paid for by the taxpayer, but, ultimately, by the creativity, hard work and application of our business men and women, industry and commerce. They deserve our support as well as our thanks.

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): As always, it is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) who talks enormous common sense. He is a real champion of the small business man in this country.

It is entirely appropriate that the my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry will wind up this debate, because he is a friend to the west country. I am sure that he will understand if I begin my remarks by referring to the sad announcement that was made at Devonport dockyard of the loss of a further 850 jobs from that dockyard with effect from September. That is entirely as a result of the fact that there is not sufficient surface ship work for two dockyards in this country.

My right hon. Friend will understand that I share the anger and concern of people from our region in Devon and Cornwall at the announcement this morning. I urge my right hon. Friend to press our right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to reconsider the decision that was made in June 1993 to place all surface ship work at Rosyth. There is a growing belief that it is now as plain as a pikestaff that there is not sufficient work for two dockyards. The Royal Navy wants a single dockyard solution; that would be better for the taxpayer. Of course, it makes tremendous sense for the defence of our nation for our ships and submarines to be maintained at one location.

I call on my right hon. Friend to press the Secretary of State for Defence to reconsider the decision and reach the only conclusion possible: there is not room for two dockyards. As we have the Trident contract, our future is guaranteed. We must bite the bullet and take the difficult decision to close Rosyth dockyard and bring the surface ship work entirely to Plymouth. I know that in addressing my right hon. Friend, as a friend to the west country, that message falls on sympathetic ears.

I must tell my right hon. Friend and my colleagues in the House that I will not stop my campaign until I believe that the right decision for the taxpayer, the Navy and my constituents is reached—a single dockyard solution which, sadly, would involve the closure of Rosyth dockyard.

I turn to the subject at hand today; the question of jobs and competitiveness in Plymouth, as well as in the rest of the country, is tied up with that. I am delighted to take part in the debate, because it seems that any debate on competitiveness divides the sheep from the goats. As we have heard, there are no Liberal Democrats present so I cannot comment on how llamas are placed in a debate of the push-me, pull-you variety à la Dr. Dolittle. Certainly, any debate on competitiveness divides the sheep from the goats, the realists from the idealists, and the people who live in the world as it really is from those who wish for some other sort of world—some far-off fantasy world.

The other day, my 12-year-old son asked me why all people could not have a job and be paid as much as they need to pay all their bills. I tried to explain that it would be great if we lived in such a world. However, that it is not the real world and it can never be the real world. My 12-year-old son will grow up and realise that; it is a pity that Labour Members never seem to take that truth on board.

I spoke in a recent debate at the university of Plymouth. During the question and answer session, one of the students talked about everyone having the right to a job. I asked her where that right to a job came from. There is no such thing as a right to a job, there is no divine right to a job and there is no natural law right to a job.

We need to create jobs. We do that by ensuring that our companies and businesses are competitive and are selling goods and services that people want to buy. That is the essence of competition. The truth, whether we like it or not, is that the world is an ever-shrinking global marketplace and our companies must compete to flourish. We need to compete to eat. We must ensure that our products and services are more attractive than those of our competitors.

When people decide to purchase goods, they look at quality, customer service and availability. By and large, if all those things are right, they then look at the price. We must ensure that the prices of our products compete favourably with those of our competitors in Europe, the United States, Japan and elsewhere.

I shall focus my remarks on a success story in Plymouth. We have a company on the Estover industrial estate called the Barden Corporation. It makes high-precision ball bearings. Hon. Members may find that a dull subject—[Interruption.] I should be delighted if they considered ball bearings an exciting product. Indeed, to see high-precision ball bearings being manufactured is exciting, because the skill level of the work force and the equipment involved are phenomenal and extremely impressive.

The Barden Corporation employs 250 people in Plymouth and it competes in a worldwide market. It has a sister company in Germany creating exactly the same product. I have visited Barden Corporation on two occasions in the past two years, and in the past few weeks I have spoken to the managing director, Dr. Graham Stirling. He is an excellent managing director—the sort of person who is giving British management a good name. He is keen to involve the best workplace practices.

Dr. Stirling told me that non-wage labour costs are so much higher at the German sister company than in the United Kingdom that the end product coming out of the German company is 25 to 30 per cent. more expensive than it is in Plymouth. I asked him what that meant for his sales, and he said that sales in the United Kingdom are increasingly dramatically and sales in Germany are reducing phenomenally. That is the sharp end of competition. That is where the rubber hits the road. It not only means that the Plymouth branch of the company is getting more business; it means that the German company has now decided that as non-wage labour costs in the United Kingdom are much cheaper—I shall come to the reason for that in a moment, although hon. Members may guess what it is—it will close down its manufacturing arm in Germany and bring it to Plymouth.

In the past six months, the company in Plymouth has taken on 40 more full-time employees, two thirds of whom are men. That is a direct result of being more competitive. That means that 40 of my constituents, who were depressed and lacking self-esteem at Christmas because they were unemployed, can now hold their heads high and enjoy the fulfilment of a rewarding job because our companies are more competitive than their German counterparts. That is the reality of the social chapter.

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): The movement that my hon. Friend is talking about is not restricted to Plymouth. In the north-east of England, we can point to Black and Decker, which closed its production capacity in Germany and transferred it to Spennymoor for exactly the same reasons. That is the trend which we are talking about, and which my hon. Friend eloquently set out.

[Mr. Michael Bates]

The Tory party is looking to the future, whereas the Labour party is constantly looking backwards to the days when perhaps they can reopen the shipyards, the steelworks and the coal mines which we know will never come back. They are mouthing the platitude of full employment while seeking to introduce measures that would remove the competitiveness that has introduced so many jobs into the north-east and Plymouth, and which the Opposition employment spokesman said will cause a massive loss of jobs.

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend makes a telling point. In one sense, he disappoints me. I had been under the impression that Devon and Cornwall were leading the nation out of recession into recovery. He tells me that is also happening in the north-east and I am forced to conclude that that is even better news.

I asked Dr. Graham Stirling why his products were cheaper than those of the German sister company. He said it was because we are not in the social chapter, or burdened by those extra costs and the extra inflexibility that the chapter and all its supporting social legislation entail and, therefore, his company in Plymouth has greater flexibility. He told me that at the German sister company, if management want to make a decision they must go through the committee process, consulting their works council, which was set up under German social legislation. That process takes months. The German Barden Corporation does not have the same velocity of decision-making as the Barden corporation in Plymouth, which means that Dr. Stirling can make the right decision now, rather than waiting for three to six months to make it. That means that he can give his customers what they want, and that is why the product in Plymouth is cheaper than that of the company's German counterpart.

Mr. Cousins: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but I wonder how all the anecdotes stack up. Is it Britain or Germany that has a balance of payments deficit in manufacturing industry?

Mr. Streeter: The hon. Gentleman will soon find out that one group of people in the world increasingly realise the damage caused by the social chapter—German and French business people, who are increasingly aware of the fact that they are suffocating under the weight of social legislation and failing to compete with British companies. Pressure is mounting from German and French industrialists to cause their Governments to shake themselves free of the dead hand of the social chapter. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) does not have his eyes open.

The Barden Corporation is one example of many companies that are doing well, free from the social chapter and it has the flexibility to give customers what they want, producing an end product at the price that they want. Opposition Members would probably say that such companies employ people on a sweatshop basis and are exploiting their workers—those poor workers, who work all the hours that there are, under terrible conditions, to produce high-precision ball bearings.

Opposition Members should open their eyes. I wonder whether they have ever visited today's modern factories in Britain. Have they looked at some of the workplaces or spoken to the staff concerned, as Conservative Members frequently do? If they did, they would realise that management is becoming increasingly enlightened. Managers believe in workplace empowerment. Managers such as Dr. Graham Stirling understand that the man putting the widget on the wodget knows best and that such workers are the people who guide and shape management decisions.

I have been to several similar companies in my constituency and just outside it and have spoken to the staff. They are very content with the legislation that is in place to protect them. They do not want further burdens from the social chapter and they are pleased to have a job.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central, who is the only Opposition Member present, can by all means have the social chapter and a national minimum wage, but he must not expect me to explain to the 40 families in Plymouth who have been put back in work this year why they are out of a job because of some ridiculous European legislation. That is where the rubber hits the road.

Last Friday, I attended a debate at Devonport high school for girls in Plymouth— [Interruption.] Hon. Members have obviously visited the school, which is one of three excellent grammar schools in Plymouth, one of which my daughter attends. The debate was on a number of issues and one of the sixth formers said that we must have the social chapter because all our workers are suffering without it. I told her that she should by all means have the social chapter, but that it would not be teachers, academics and intelligent high-fliers—the people who are advocating it—who would suffer. It would be the ordinary workers, who would be thrown out of a job onto the scrap heap of life just to satisfy some academic, theoretical notion of justice. I wish that Opposition Members would wake up to the real world.

We heard earlier about positive rights for employees, but they already have such rights. Opposition Members want to place all those so-called positive rights in statute.

The House will be pleased to learn that I have a very positive relationship with my wife. I know that it is important to listen to her, spend time with her, encourage her and share my overdraft with her. I do not need those things to be set out in statute or to be told the best way to conduct my relationship. It works on the basis of partnership. Management increasingly understand that their employees are their best asset. My wife is my best asset. I do not need a statutory instrument to tell me that. I do not need a Minister at the Dispatch Box to tell me how to love my wife. Management and employees today do not need chapter and verse set out in endless legislation to tell them how to conduct best practice in the workplace.

Mr. Cousins: Did the hon. Gentleman vote against the Child Support Act 1991?

Mr. Streeter: The hon. Gentleman, who has complained several times about the time that this debate is taking, constantly makes spurious and irrelevant interventions. If he wants us to get on to other business, he will learn to keep his counsel.

I have mentioned the impact of our being outside the social chapter. I feel so strongly about this—it is not merely words, or a totem pole around which Conservative Members dance. It means something; it means jobs in Britain compared to our European competitor countries.

We must not put off foreign investors by discussing and describing European legislation and our role in Europe so that they gain the impression that we do not see our future as being in Europe. Not many Members are by instinct more sceptical about European integration than I, but I recognise the economic reality. It behoves all of us, when we discuss such subjects, to take care to explain that we do not see our future outside the European business community, but very much within it, so that we continue to attract United States and Japanese investment, which we have been so successful in doing during the past few years.

Secondly, it is important that we do not give employees the impression that we are denying them some benefit. I believe with every ounce of my body that that is not true. Therefore, let us explain to people carefully that it is in their interests that we to continue to say no to the social chapter, so that those 40 families in Plymouth and thousands more in the nation are not denied the jobs which they so desperately need and so richly deserve.

Let us continue to persuade our European allies that it is in Europe's interests to shake ourselves free from the inflexibility and the suffocating nature of the social chapter. We are not just competing with Germany and France, but with America and Japan. For the sake of the future of Europe, let us continue to make our arguments in the European marketplace and in the corridors of power in Europe that it is in their own best interests to rethink the provisions of the social chapter, and to shake themselves free from it.

I have much more that I was going to say, but, in view of the time and of the fact that other hon. Members want to speak, I shall curtail my remarks. It is abundantly clear that, as we talk to business people in our constituencies, the economic framework for companies to compete abroad is now in place thanks to the policies of the Conservative Government. The thing that gives us the edge on our European competitors is our freedom from the suffocating and stifling provisions of the social chapter.

Now is not the time—just as we are coming out of recession and into prosperity, and just as enterprise is stirring again in this nation—to weaken our resolve and to go back to the bad old days of over-regulation and bureaucracy.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There are hon. Members here this morning who are obviously filibustering to stop the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill being discussed again. I asked Madam Speaker earlier this morning whether she could introduce a time limit on speeches. I do point out in aid of that plea that, following the Government's leaving of the European exchange rate mechanism in disarray, the Prime Minister only spoke for 27 minutes and the Leader of the Opposition for 41 minutes. Today, on this Bill, there have been longer and longer speeches from Government Members to filibuster and to do down disabled people in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I have nothing further to add to what Madam Speaker said this morning.

Mr. Streeter: I am incensed by that intervention. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central spoke for 47 minutes and has intervened on a number of occasions, often with spurious and pathetic points. I yield to no one in my concern for the disabled. I am making a speech which I believe to be in the interests of my constituents, and I resent implications to the contrary.

In conclusion, now is not the time for us to blur our vision for the future or for us to yield to faint hearts, academics and theorists who want to enter into social legislation. Now is the time to stand firm and continue the economic regeneration of this nation.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): This debate is very important, and demands careful and considered discussion because the Government's White Paper on competitiveness is one of most significant that they have produced.

One of the particular strengths of the White Paper—I am pleased to see the Minister on the Front Bench—is that it is frank about the problems that Britain faces in improving its competitiveness; it is not simply a document announcing that everything in the garden is rosy. The document contains some criticisms which we must accept are significant in explaining Britain's poor industrial performance since the war.

In the discussion on management, for example, it says that an attitude survey of more than 1,000 managers in Europe's smaller companies found that

> "UK managers thought they were the best in Europe and their companies second only to Germany. Other countries disagreed, placing both UK managers and companies third out of five . . . this 'perception gap' was greater for UK managers than for any others".

We have a problem of complacency about the standards of management in this country.

On training, the document says:

> "technical qualifications tend to be less common and less well rewarded in UK industry than in . . . other countries".

The Government's meaty and substantial White Paper forces us to accept that we need to do more to improve the competitiveness of British industry.

It is admirable that my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) decided when she won the ballot to raise this subject. I am sorry that she is not in her place, but I believe that she is upstairs with Hansard, ensuring that her speech is as elegant to read as it was satisfying to hear. She made a point which I thought was particularly significant when she addressed the old canard about whether something is special about manufacturing industry.

My hon. Friend reminded us that many of the arguments about manufacturing industry turn on the completely bogus assumption that physical products are wealth-creating, while non-physical products are not. One of the great difficulties that one has in explaining to people from, for example the Soviet bloc—particular victims of that fallacy—is that the physical box of a computer may be much less valuable than the software programme which enables that computer to generate useful conclusions. In future, I can well imagine a world in which computers are given away free provided that the purchaser buys the software. Value increasingly rests with those services, not with physical products.

We are often told that we have suffered from a relative decline in our manufacturing industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye did not mention the fact that that claim is often based on a statistical artifice. If a motor manufacturing company decides, instead of employing its own staff in the canteen, its own security guards or its own in-house design team, to contract out the functions to an external caterer, security firm or design company—that is a widespread trend in British industry and a very healthy one—that is shown up in the statistics as a decline in manufacturing employment and a rise in services industry employment. The changes in employment that we are supposed to have seen in Britain in the 1980s and 1990s could well be statistical changes rather than real changes in the relative size of manufacturing and non-manufacturing industry.

Mr. Sheerman: That is absurd.

Mr. Willetts: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—the only representative of the Labour party present—does not accept that possibility, which the Confederation of British Industry has pointed out in the past.

Mr. Sheerman: I speak as someone who represents a true manufacturing constituency. I disagree with the hon. Member because, according to all the other criteria, the number of people employed in the manufacturing process for engineering, chemicals and everything else declined steeply during the 1980s. I am sure that the Minister must agree with me.

Mr. Willetts: My precise point is that the business of measuring the number of people involved in the manufacturing process is a jolly sight more complicated than the hon. Gentleman seems to accept.

Mr. Sheerman: Let me take the hon. Gentleman out and about around the country.

Mr. Willetts: Havant, which I represent, also has a strong manufacturing base.

As a result of what has been achieved since 1979, it now takes two people to manufacture the same thing that it took three people to make in 1979, when the Labour Government were in power. We can take pride in that achievement.

That intervention from the hon. Member for Huddersfield offers me a good opportunity to draw attention to some of the distinctions between Conservative and Labour policy on the subject. Perhaps the most important is that we care about the competitiveness of British industry—unlike the Opposition, as is all too apparent; the empty Opposition Benches bear eloquent testimony to the Labour party's apparent lack of interest in our competitiveness.

One of the arguments so often adopted by the Opposition—and, sadly, by some people in the media—is that the fact that we believe in competitive and flexible labour markets means that we believe that Britain can survive and thrive only as some sort of sweatshop in which people earn low wages so that they can compete with the poorest countries of the third world. A flexible labour market involves much more than just wages, as several of my hon. Friends have explained.

Havant is home to an IBM factory and I am pleased to report that that factory's employees are well paid. When it competes for big manufacturing contracts with IBM factories elsewhere in Europe, the fact that its staff can work three 12-hour shifts a week—whereas 12-hour shifts are impossible in many continental countries—and can work on Saturdays without having to go through complicated negotiations through multi-tier consultation procedures, gives that factory, like other manufacturing plants in Britain, a competitive advantage. That is what real flexibility in the labour market is about. It has nothing to do with cutting the last 10p an hour off people's wages; it enables managers and work forces to operate together in the way that they think best.

Another crucial distinction between us and the Labour party is that we understand that open markets and free competition represent the best way in which to improve the performance of our industry. Too often in the past we have been tempted by the idea that by picking a winner and concentrating industry on one particular firm of international size we will be able to face the competition. All the lessons from the serious analysis that has been done shows that that is the exact opposite of the truth. The best way to have an industry that is competitive internationally is for it to face intense competition domestically from rival domestic manufacturers and also from imported products in a free trading environment with the lowest possible tariffs. That is the best way to stimulate local industry to be as successful as possible.

Various gurus have written about business success. I confess that I have long been an admirer of Michael Porter of the Harvard business school, who has written on that subject. In his publication, "The Competitive Advantage of Nations", he says:

> "Intense local rivalry is one of the most significant pressures on companies to innovate and upgrade. Companies almost never succeed abroad unless they compete with capable rivals at home. Such rivalry forces competitors to lower costs, improve the quality of their products and services, and create new products and processes . . .
> Vigorous domestic competition ultimately pressures domestic competitors to seek global markets and toughens them to succeed there."

The dangerous illusion that, if only we had big British firms of an international size that could look to a large domestic market, we could deliver industrial success, did much damage to British industry in the 1960s and 1970s as Governments set themselves up as marriage brokers, bringing together disparate firms in large organisations, which, sadly, could not thrive internationally.

Too often, the Opposition draw the wrong lesson from the Japanese experience. We are told that Miti has somehow steered Japanese industry along the route chosen by Japanese officials. Far from it. Miti's strategy for Japan in the post-war period was to have one Japanese car manufacturer, but the entrepreneurial spirit of Japanese car manufacturers would not allow that.Three, if not four, significant domestic car manufacturers were fighting for a share of the Japanese domestic market. That is what gave Japan its enormous competitive advantage in motor manufacturing, not grand strategies formulated by Japanese officials.

The recognition that domestic competition drives competitiveness is a crucial distinction between the Conservative and Labour parties. Another distinction lies in our view about the significance of inward investment. We all understand that one of Government's great successes has been to attract nearly half the American and Japanese investment in Europe to this country since 1979. Because of the success of that investment, one of the few predictions that one can confidently make, in a changing world, about the structure of the British economy in the next decade is that manufacturing industry will increase as a proportion of British gross domestic product, as Japanese car plants and colour television factories come on stream and increase our manufacturing output.

How have we attracted international investment to this country? My right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry kindly visited a conspicuous example of that inward investment earlier this week when he opened an extension to the plant run by Wyeth, an international drug company, in my constituency. Wyeth has made a £20 million investment in manufacturing and packaging over-the-counter medicines for the entire European market. It carried out the review which many international firms carried out as the single market loomed. Having looked at its various factories dotted around the European Community, it decided that it was silly to continue to manufacture in so many places. In order to concentrate its manufacturing, it decided to close several plants but took the strategic decision to expand its British plant.

I took the opportunity of Tuesday's meeting to ask members of the firm's senior management from America why they had taken that decision. They said that it was because Britain had lower tax rates, a well-trained work force and an environment that was favourable to business. They said that, although the British regulatory regime that applied to pharmaceuticals was tough—they had no objections to tough regulation—it was also stable and predictable, and one could get decisions out of the regulators fast. Those are the keys to competitive success and the reasons why we have attracted investment to this country. I take this opportunity to thank the Minister for coming to Wyeth on Tuesday to open that plant—I know that he had to speak in a debate on GATT later that day.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman refers to inward investment in industry. Does he not think it a rather one-eyed approach to disregard altogether the outward divestment of jobs, such as the jobs at INMOS in my constituency? One of the most brilliantly successful state-of-the-art computer companies in the world went from this country and resettled in Italy and France, just as Parke Davis went to Germany and other jobs go to the continent. Does not he agree that we cannot make a rational judgment if we not only disregard the outward divestment of jobs to Europe but do not even count them? If he would like to check on that, he can ask Ministers, as I have done, how many British jobs have been siphoned out of this country to Europe. No figures are collected about those jobs.

Mr. Willetts: In a modern world economy, of course businesses will move in and out. There is no point in trying to pretend that the British industrial base will remain fixed. The important thing is the net flow, and the net flow has been very successful.

Although I bow to the hon. Gentleman's expertise in relation to INMOS, as it is in his constituency, I regard the story of attempts by successive British Governments—and especially the last Labour Government—to prop up British industry in that respect as another warning of the way in which picking winners can easily go wrong. We do not hear in those stories about the higher taxation borne by employees and companies to finance Ministers picking the firms that they wish to subsidise. We have a sophisticated capital market, allocating resources into micro-electronics and chip manufacturing. I see no reason why the decisions of industry should be interfered with by Government in that respect.

I shall now discuss one or two things that Governments can do, because Governments obviously have a responsibility in improving industrial competitiveness, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye rightly said. One of those things relates to education and training.

I believe that education is much more important as a Government responsibility than training. I become worried by demands for big increases in Government expenditure to subsidise training. Training is a matter, above all, for employers and their employees: at the training level, it is for the firm to work out what skills it needs to thrive.

It is a responsibility of Government to ensure that people emerge from school well educated. Often that does not involve their being masters of the latest technical fad, because that may change in a few years. It is a matter of giving people a rigorous education so that their minds are sufficiently well trained to enable them to keep up with scientific and intellectual developments in the decades ahead. I hope that it does not sound too old fashioned to argue that a rigorous training in the classics, English literature or mathematics may well be a better basis for creating a highly skilled work force in future than trying to run after the exact state-of-the-art keyboard techniques, which will change.

I suspect that a traditional British education has been crucial in the success of British service industries such as advertising. It is important that subjects that have a history, a discipline and a rigour are not displaced by various studies that are not difficult enough to guarantee that the children who are educated in them emerge with a sufficiently rigorous education.

Mr. Trend: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has read the evidence that Gottfried Bruder gave the Trade and Industry Select Committee, in which he said:

> "In most continental countries most people would have no problem in declaring that the broadest possible general knowledge is an integral part of education. Vague concepts of personality formation . . . seem to dominate in Britain."

That is one of our key problems.

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Of course I agree with him about that.

The Government have further responsibilities. One aspect, which is discussed eloquently in the White Paper, is public purchasing. The discussion in the document recognises the significance of public purchasing. I am slightly worried about some of the ways in which public purchasing is developing.

One of the liveliest debates that is going on at the moment—it has already cropped up this morning—is about British standard 5750. I must confess to being—I am afraid that the Minister might not agree with this—a bit of a sceptic about BS 5750. One of the things that worries me is the way in which Government Departments, local authorities and public bodies now say that the only way to get on to their list of approved suppliers is to have BS 5750. We know what happens. An artificial market is created in which consultants pop around and say, "If you pay us £1,500, we will get you BS 5750." Many of the industries and services involved do not seem to me to be suitable for BS 5750. Perhaps I can give one example of that.

[Mr. Willetts]

A junior trade of my own is that I undertake a modest amount of pamphleteering. I was surprised the other week when a think tank—the Social Market Foundation—published one of my pamphlets on health policy, which was priced, if I remember correctly, at £7.

Mr. Trend: Modest.

Mr. Willetts: Who knows whether it was worth that or not? A health authority wrote in and ordered the pamphlet, and it was sent off with an invoice. A few weeks later, we had a request from the purchasing side of the health authority saying that, as part of the process of securing BS 5750, it needed to investigate the quality of all its suppliers, and asking the Social Market Foundation to fill in the enclosed form so that it would know that it was dealing with an approved supplier. I thought that that was taking the BS 5750 approach to public purchasing just a little bit too far.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I am extremely interested in what my hon. Friend says, and it should be noted that his latest pamphlet, just produced by the Social Market Foundation, is now priced at £10. As it was only a short time ago that his pamphlet on health policy was priced at £7, what are we to conclude from that? I take it that the quality of my hon. Friend's thinking and the ideas that he has to offer by way of policy have continued to appreciate by a quite remarkable extent. I am very ready to believe that. Will he confirm that that is the case?

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is quite right. I have to confess—and I am grateful for the plug—that my latest pamphlet, "Civic Conservatism" is indeed priced at £10. It is a larger and fatter pamphlet, and we price it by the yard. That is the explanation.

The final area in which there is Government responsibility is, of course, regulation and deregulation, to which several of my hon. Friends have already referred. We must ensure that the burden of regulation that industry faces is not too heavy. That is why the deregulation initiative is so crucial. Although we all support it in general, the test of the success of the deregulation initiative will be the individual difficult decisions that have to be taken. In particular, it will come whenever there is a panic about some particular problem; as democratic politicians, we all find ourselves under pressure from the people in our constituency surgeries and from people in the media who say, "Why won't the Government legislate to do something about that?" The next time there is a salmonella scare, we should not rush into something like the Food Safety Act 1990, because policy making by panic, in which we suddenly impose a new set of regulations after the latest accident and disaster, is something in which to engage in haste and about which to repent at leisure. That requires discipline on all of us. It will require tough decisions in future.

I hope also that it will be possible to ensure that the regulatory regime remains simple and stable. We now have industries, such as broadcasting, where the number of regulators with an interest has multiplied so much that it is difficult for an individual television company or broadcaster to know exactly whom they have to deal with. There are roles for several different regulatory bodies, and that can cause confusion.

I hope that, in education and training, public purchasing and deregulation, the Government can pursue the admirable initiatives that they have already launched to ensure the crucial objective in which Conservative Members believe—making the British economy and British industry as competitive as possible.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I shall concentrate on one aspect of the competitiveness of the United Kingdom—the contribution that disabled people can make to our economic competitiveness. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on her choice of subject for debate. I believe that she made that decision imaginatively and tactfully, because it enables us to discuss an issue with which she—in her capacity as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister for the Disabled—is very much concerned.

I hope that there will be time to debate the second motion on the Order Paper. Perhaps we will have an opportunity to do so, because I am sure that my hon. Friends recognise the desirability of the House having an opportunity for a further debate on the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill.

The subject for debate now is the competitiveness of the United Kingdom. There is no doubt that in the rapidly emerging world of global interdependence and global open trade which the new GATT agreement has done so much to bring closer, the competitiveness and quality above all of nations' work forces will be at a premium.

At a conference on equal opportunities organised by the CBI last September, Mr. Howard Davies, the director-general of the CBI, observed that "unless we secure the best contribution from all the talent that is available to us we will simply not be able to compete effectively."

That is right, and at the moment, to too great an extent, our society is denying itself the contribution that disabled people can make to our economic performance.

Disabled people are three times more likely to be unemployed, and they are unemployed for longer. When they are in work they are in lower-paid jobs and worse working conditions. A survey by the Spastics Society found that a third of employers who were willing to interview would not interview an applicant for a job who had qualifications equal to other applicants but was registered as disabled. But all the research evidence shows that disabled people are good workers. Nobody should be surprised at that because they appreciate the fact that they have an opportunity to work, and they are determined to hold their jobs and to make the best contribution they can. The survey evidence demonstrates that disabled people are average or better job performers and average or better in attendance.

The booklet produced by the Department of Employment which is entitled "Employing People with Disabilities" states:

"People with disabilities are likely to have had a lot of practice in converting day-to-day obstacles into opportunities. They often develop extra skills because of their disability, such as effective communication, good concentration, dealing positively with change and the ability to recognise and use opportunities imaginatively."

Those are, indeed, among the most sought-after qualities in employment and it is good to see the Government recognising that reality.

We know that the potential of people who have the misfortune of some impairment to be able to overcome it so that it is not, in effect, a disability has been greatly enhanced by the development of information technology. People with serious disabilities are none the less frequently able to make an extremely valuable contribution to economic activity through the use of computers and working at keyboards.

The contribution that disabled people can make to the United Kingdom's competitiveness is before us all because of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, but in any case it is an issue which we should address. The Government have started to think about the economics of it because they have produced a compliance cost assessment in relation to the proposals in the Bill. The figure that they have produced for compliance is £17 billion. A compliance cost of £17 billion for a measure before the House is an extremely important issue in relation to the competitiveness of British firms and the British economy. But I have to say that regard that figure as very implausible. I believe that a Department of Social Security official was quoted anonymously as going so far as to say that the figure was plucked out of the air.

It is certainly true that the time scale for implementing and complying with the provisions of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill is not limited to the five-year period that seems to be supposed in the compliance cost assessment. It is strange that a document, produced by the Government after Committee proceedings on the Bill had concluded, ignored the important all-party amendment, which was readily agreed in Committee, to provide that the timetable for compliance with aspects of the legislation would be at the discretion of the relevant Secretary of State. The assessment tells us that compliance costs for transport services will amount to £6 billion. It assumes that compliance would be required over a maximum period of five years, but the Bill does not contain such a proposition. The Bill would allow the Secretary of State for Transport to require implementation over a much longer period. He could follow the model of the United States of America, where the federal Government have said that a 20-year period is appropriate. Plainly, all vehicles will be replaced over 20 years. That £6 billion figure, therefore, disappears from the compliance cost assessment.

It is incumbent on the Government carefully to analyse the realities of the costs because much is at stake. Enormous benefits and opportunities for our economy and our international competitiveness will result if we mobilise the talents and abilities of so many disabled people, who as it is are denied the opportunity to make their contribution to society and to our economic performance, often because of simple misunderstanding, but too often still because of prejudice and discrimination.

Ministers should address themselves systematically and open-mindedly to the potential benefits of the Bill. In the document, the Department of the Environment invites us to contemplate construction costs of £10 billion, a very round figure that it has conjured out of the air. Ten billion pounds of additional construction activity would be very important to the economy. Such economic activity would create enormous benefits in employment, tax flows to the Exchequer, national insurance contributions and the modernisation of buildings and plant, which would improve the competitiveness of the British economy.

The Institute of Directors considers that the benefits that would be conferred on the economy and our competitiveness if the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill were introduced are tangible and quantifiable. It no doubt draws some encouragement from evidence offered by the National Federation of Small Business Owners in America, which has said that the introduction of comparable legislation—the Americans With Disabilities Act—has led to new business opportunities. That is not surprising if one considers what a large consumer market there is among disabled people. There are 6.2 million disabled people in this country. If they are better enabled to avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in a range of economic activities in our society, all sorts of new business activities will result. It will lead to a strengthening of the economy's domestic base, which, as a number of my hon. Friends have argued, is an essential precondition for our international competitiveness and our export capacity. That factor cannot sensibly be ignored.

Even if the compliance costs that the Government have crudely and exaggeratedly estimated at £17 billion were to prove correct, we have to net off against that figure the benefits to the economy and to competitiveness of enabling disabled people to have the fullest opportunity to be workers and consumers. That is a large amount to be deducted from the £17 billion. If we bear in mind the fact that the £17 billion should be spread over, say, 20 years, we are talking of compliance costs averaged at less than £1 billion a year. If the economic benefits are then taken into account, I strongly suspect that we would be left with minimal or perhaps zero net costs. There would be the benefit of enabling a significant element of our population to be employed and to make the contribution of which they are potentially capable.

I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends who are Ministers, and especially those at the Department of Trade and Industry, will make a new, more careful and, if I may say so, more open-minded study of the issue. I have been slightly disappointed with the response so far when I have tabled questions for written answer. Only this week, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury once again declined to undertake a cost-benefit analysis. He said that the relevant information was not easily available and that the cost of undertaking the exercise was disproportionate. I recognise that it would be a difficult and sophisticated exercise. I recognise also that it is not an exercise which could be carried out with absolute precision. At the same time, I feel that the potential benefit of ending discrimination is so great that it would be worth the investment of time and energy and resources within the Treasury and the Departments of Trade and Industry and of Employment—the economic Ministries—to make a thorough and systematic study of the issue. There are huge benefits for us if only we know how to avail ourselves of them.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I am enjoying my hon. Friend's speech. He has spoken well about the contribution that disabled people could make. Does he agree that the public sector could play a greater role in providing further opportunities for disabled people? Although the Department of Employment has fulfilled its quota, not many other Government Departments have done so. Some public bodies, such as the BBC, employ hardly any disabled people.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend makes a helpful point. The Government have suggested that the £17 billion cost of compliance would fall entirely on "private industry". I think that that was the term used in answer to a question not long ago. That is a misconception and my hon. Friend has given me the opportunity to draw attention to it. The cost of compliance would fall extensively across the public sector as well as the private sector. It is incumbent on the public sector—especially the Government, who should take a lead—to ensure that it does everything that it can to maximise opportunity while minimising its costs. We must recognise, of course, realistically and responsibly, that costs will be incurred. I reiterate, however, what I consider to be the profoundly important argument that there would be major benefits in the long term. In unlocking economic potential, there would be major benefits to the public sector as well as to the private sector.

The Government have made the welcome announcement that they are embarking on consultation in a number of relevant sectors such as financial services, transport and access with a view to considering what policies might be brought forward. The Government have gone so far to say that that will be done with a view to preparing a Bill that would focus, to the satisfaction of employers, of the Government and of disabled people, on discrimination and on providing opportunities for disabled people to make their contribution to our national life, including, importantly, our national competitiveness.

The Government have promised that the consultation will be completed within six months of the announcement. I think that the announcement was made a month ago. It is exciting and encouraging, as we are clearly moving forward quite rapidly in the development of policy, with the Government playing a major part in a constructive approach to the matter. Notwithstanding the reluctance to date of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury to cause his Department to consider the economic benefits of anti-discrimination legislation, the Government will inevitably have to consider the matter. It is not too soon to consider the methodology of such an inquiry.

We must consider the matter on a micro-economic level, to discover the implications of equal opportunities for disabled people at company level. A great deal of evidence could readily be made available. Some of this country's leading and best-established firms, including British Telecom, British Gas, Boots and McDonald's, are members of the Employers Forum on Disability. Those companies can demonstrate to other businesses that good practice in relation to disabled people is good business. They can show that disabled people can make a distinctive and particularly valuable contribution to business activities. Those companies would be able to offer useful advice by way of detailed case studies and show the benefits as well as the costs in their operations. They would be able to offer evidence about policies that they have chosen to adopt at company level to encourage disabled people.

Far from the costs being significantly disadvantageous, I believe that we will find that those firms have gained enormous benefits. I am sure that they could also provide evidence to show that equal opportunities for disabled people, just like equal pay for women where they do work of equal value, is not ruinous for companies, as many feared at the outset.

I hope that my right hon. Friends will be willing to consult organisations such as the Employers Forum on Disability and the CBI. The CBI has told me that it is anxious that the benefits of the policy change, which it must anticipate is going to come, should be assessed seriously and responsibly.

A cost-benefit analysis would also have to consider the macro-economic benefits, but we have already discussed those.

In this intensely competitive open-trading world which is so rapidly unfolding, our competitiveness will depend above all on the quality of our work force. The United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand have already recognised that they cannot afford to deny themselves the contribution that disabled people can offer. They have realised that they must avail themselves of that large, latent source of strength. Most of the countries of continental Europe are lagging in that respect, as are countries in south-east Asia, so we have a good opportunity now.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that there is no future for the British economy in chasing labour costs down market. We will never succeed in competing on wage costs with the Chinese or the Brazilians. We must develop and release all the best potential of the people in our society. That is right in moral and humane terms, and it is at the least prudent economically.

We must find the best ways to get disabled people into work. I welcome the improvements in the disability working allowance. As we are discussing this aspect of competitiveness and what the disabled can contribute, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People on what he has been able to achieve here. Perversities remain in the social security system which must be addressed. It is absurd that if a lone mother with two children increases her earnings from £80 a week to £180 a week she keeps only £20 out of that increase. Much more work remains to be done to ensure that all our people encounter no more discouragement to enter work and to earn more or to contribute than is absolutely unavoidable.

Of course, we need to invest more in education and training. Referring again to the contribution that disabled people can make, training and enterprise councils need to do more than many of them are currently doing. TEC performance in that respect is variable. Some are imaginative, enlightened and forward looking, but the Spastics Society survey entitled "Wasted Opportunities" showed that there are too many wasted opportunities in that aspect of TEC responsibility. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will use all possible leverage to ensure that TECs offer the best training opportunities that can be provided for disabled people. The Department of Employment has leverage in this because it must approve TECs' corporate plans and provide their funding.

We must encourage and enable all our people, including disabled people, to make the best contribution that they can to our economy. It is for us to decide how to do that at national level, and we should do so.

Mr. Derek Conway and Mr. Andrew Mitchell.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will know that the Speaker has been looking into the way in which private Members' business is handled in the House. There was an appeal for fairness from the Opposition Dispatch Box this morning, so that two important motions would have a fair share of the debate. Not only has the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People just voted in the Lobby, but his Parliamentary Private Secretary led the debate with an hour-long speech to stop us getting on to the disabled persons— [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me. Madam Speaker is dealing with the matter to which the hon. Member referred and has already dealt with another point of order on the subject this morning. I later repeated her decision.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you consider having a further look—perhaps you could pass the word on to Madam Speaker—possibly a Speaker's Conference, with a view to trying to get a little sense into the situation, especially as we had many debates about the disabled just before the recess but could not get a Bill through, although Government Members and the Prime Minister have been on the Normandy beaches talking to crippled veterans and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are all well aware of the difficulties that you face today. Motions 2 and 3 on the Order Paper are on the same subject, which is of great concern to Members on both sides of the House. Clearly it is impossible for us to move the closure on a motion, but in fairness to the hon. Members who tabled motions 2 and 3, would it not be fair to ensure that there is some limited discussion on those motions? They deal with a subject which gives rise to considerable and understandable emotion. Could you say, perhaps, that the present debate should finish at two o'clock so as to enable proper discussion of the remaining two motions?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a matter for the House, as the hon. Member knows full well.

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. Will it be possible for there to be some investigation of the conduct of Opposition Members this morning? It seems to Conservative Members that there has been an honest attempt to move the debate along fairly and firmly, but that it has been interrupted and delayed by a 47-minute speech from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), by bogus points of order and by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) walking into the Chamber and wasting 15 minutes on—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether it would be possible now to get a genuine point of order. That would be quite an occasion in the House.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): Further to the point of order from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), Mr. Deputy Speaker, regarding a possible Speaker's Conference on private Members' Bills, may I avail myself of the opportunity to ask you to let Madam Speaker know that many of us in the House believe that no private Member's Bill should be introduced which requires a money resolution?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A few weeks ago, an equally important private Member's motion was carried unanimously in the House calling on the Government to provide time to complete the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill. Has the Minister responsible, who did not oppose that motion on that day, indicated whether he wishes to make a statement as to when the Government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has been made clear that the Minister has made no indication whatever about a statement.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice. Is there any way in which the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill can be debated in the House without Ministers trying to talk it out? As a relatively new hon. Member, I seek your advice on whether private Members' Bills from Back-Bench hon. Members can be given time for a proper debate instead of having this disgraceful behaviour from Ministers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Procedural advice cannot be given across the Floor of the House, but it can be given privately.

1.30 pm

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): We have been taking part today in a fascinating debate of huge importance and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on introducing it. There could not be a more important subject to our country, as I should have thought the Opposition would agree, than the competitiveness of British commerce and industry because that is the basis for the number of jobs that we shall have in the future.

I must confess that I feel great sympathy for the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins), whose speech I listened to with great care and which I found very interesting. He struck me as being a little like a general who is right out in front and looks around to find no army behind him. This is a hugely important debate and, while there is the odd infantryman lying around now, there was nobody behind the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central for the whole morning. Nobody from the Labour party took any interest whatever in the crucial subject of whether our business can compete in the world today.

Mr. Waterson: Would my hon. Friend also draw attention to the fact that, for the same period of this important debate, nobody was present from the Liberal Democrats?

Sir Michael Grylls: My hon. Friend took the words out of mouth; I was about to refer to the Liberal Democrats. What my hon. Friend has said is absolutely true. It is extraordinary that a party which seems to have increasing pretensions to being an important party did not even bother to turn up.

Ms Lynne: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I point out to the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) that I was in the House for the speech of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) when he was talking about disabled people's rights?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Sir Michael Grylls: That was only about half an hour ago and it is now nearly half-past one. Throughout the vast morning when this hugely important subject was being debated, no Liberal Democrat was present. However, let us now move quickly away from that matter.

Mr. Madden: The hon. Gentleman has been dealing with the interest in the debate, and clearly the bulk of the contributions this morning have been made from the Conservative Benches. Will he consult the sponsor of the motion—the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), who is placed conveniently next to him—to see whether, in view of the extensive debate that has taken place, she would be willing for the debate on her motion to conclude at two o'clock, which would enable a brief debate to take place on motions Nos. 2 and 3?

Sir Michael Grylls: It is a great pleasure to liaise with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye at any time of the day or night, if the House happens to be sitting then. You would shut me up swiftly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I tried to intervene to say what should or should not be in order or how the procedures of the House should be undertaken, because that is your prerogative and it would be impertinent of me to trespass on it.

One of the central arguments of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central was his criticism of the excessive dividends that British public companies tend to pay. It is true that in the past two years dividends have increased, but the hon. Member must accept that it is a case of pluses and minuses. He did not respond to my intervention when I asked whether a future Labour Government would legislate to control dividends. I assume that his refusal to reply means that they would not intervene.

Mr. Skinner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael Grylls: The hon. Member was not even in the Chamber at the time, but I will give way to him in a moment.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central must consider the pluses and minuses. Of course one can criticise the level of dividend payments in Britain and in the United States, which are higher than those paid in Germany and Japan, but that is partly due to our effective capital markets, certainly for public companies. Those markets represent some of the most efficient markets for raising money for investment of any countries. There are large gaps in those markets, but they work efficiently for large quoted companies.It is important that those who put their money into the stock exchange, either as direct investors through their own shares or through pension funds or however, get a proper return on their money.

I do not think that there is much to be gained by debating whether there should be a certain level of dividend payments. The important thing is whether companies can effectively raise capital to invest or renew their capital, which is necessary in times of high inflation but not so important now that we are lucky enough to have a low inflation rate.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman has a cheek to talk about people being absent from the Chamber when he has 10 extra jobs. He moonlights for 10 other companies, as well as being a member of Ian Greer Associates. He makes money hand over fist. He may talk about restrictions on dividends, but why does he not have the guts to declare now how much money he is making on the side from those four directorships, five advisorships and one consultancy as well as from being a member of Ian Greer Associates? When he tells us all that, we shall be better informed and then he might be able to turn up for work as often as I do.

Sir Michael Grylls: Unlike the hon. Member, I have been here for the majority of the morning although I have other responsibilities. I believe that that is a great advantage to the contributions that I can make to the House. If one asks a busy person to do something, he generally succeeds in doing it.

The hon. Member asked a question, but he does not even have the courtesy to look at me when I reply. I do not believe that we need to take his intervention too seriously, but if the burden of his point—it is not strictly about the motion—is that he would like to have a House of Commons full of people with no other occupation outside politics, he should say so.

Mr. Skinner: One Member, one job.

Sir Michael Grylls: I am not giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) invited me to intervene.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will do some inviting now. Will the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) and Opposition Members stick to the motion?

Sir Michael Grylls: I fear that I was seduced down an avenue into which I should not have gone. To give way to the hon. Member for Bolsover is a normal politeness; the fact that he misused and abused that privilege in Parliament is something on which the House must make its own judgment.

I wish to underscore the importance of the White Paper. As my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said in his excellent speech an hour ago, the White Paper was bold because it underlined many of the weaknesses and challenges in the British industrial and commercial economy. There would have been no point in carrying out a public relations exercise saying how wonderful everything is. In my experience of this place, it is somewhat unusual because it portrays the British industrial economy honestly, warts and all. Anyone who studies the economies of the leading industrial nations in the world will know that they all have pluses and minuses: some are stronger in one area while some are stronger in others.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant quoted Professor Michael Porter from Harvard university, who made an excellent point in his textbook on competitiveness. The view of that great expert on competitiveness throughout the world is that the most successful companies are those that operate in a deregulated economy. That reinforces the fact that we should support the Government in their deregulation initiative and face up to measures that will simplify life for businesses. If a firm wants to expand and has the money to do so, it must not be tripped up by unnecessary regulations. Too often, businesses that want to expand their factories because they are doing well are told by planners that they cannot do so because it would be too complicated. If planners and those involved in statutory procedures would be a little more positive, it would help our competitiveness enormously.

Huge improvements have been made in some areas, but we tend to remember the bad events and forget the good ones. Many positive measures have been taken to relieve business of excessive taxation—for example, simplifying and improving the loan guarantee scheme for firms that wish to raise money to expand but do not have adequate security to do so have been hugely important. Since the Government enhanced and improved that scheme in the last Budget, the number of firms applying for loans has doubled month on month, which is a good sign that people are not only taking up the scheme but finding it a positive advantage.

The abolition of inheritance tax for quoted companies is also important. One may ask why companies should not pay some tax when a business is passed on from one generation to another. Too often, however, when an owner-manager has died or retired, the business has had to be sold to pay the high inheritance taxes and that unit of competition has then disappeared. That is the damage done by high capital taxation. Almost any capital taxation distorts business decisions and damages the independent small companies which are likely to be set up in this country.

The abolition of inheritance tax on non-quoted companies by the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), was one of the most important steps taken in the Government's whole lifetime. It has enabled companies to be passed on intact from one generation to another and to grow in the hands of each generation of owner-managers. The Government should be congratulated on having done that. We have to keep up the work on deregulation. We have to keep up the work on tax reform. Tax reform is needed. Capital gains tax is outdated. It distorts business decisions and stops the proper flow of capital going in the direction that it should.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): The hon. Gentleman talks about abolishing capital gains tax. Would he mind telling the House what he would replace it with? Would he increase value added tax on fuel? Would he increase direct taxation and shift the burden from the rich to the poor further than it has been shifted? Is that what the hon. Gentleman would do?

Mr. Skinner: I think that he would.

Sir Michael Grylls: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. I am not trying to make a Budget, so I do not have to balance my books. I am simply saying that capital taxes are distorting and damaging. As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, capital gains tax raises only a few hundred million pounds—a relatively small amount. If capital gains tax were abolished, the advantage that would flow to the country is that new jobs and new wealth would be created. The new wealth would be put into productive hands and create jobs.

I say to the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) that we must get rid of that prejudice—because that is what it is. To some extent, a few years ago, I was enticed by the idea that capital gains tax had a degree of fairness, so I understand the feeling, but it is far too damaging to allow that type of prejudice to stay in our minds because it distorts business decisions and restricts the creation of wealth and therefore of jobs.

I welcome the White Paper and I welcome the fact that it is radical, open and honest. I am sure that the Government will continue to pursue the initiatives in the White Paper, especially in relation to financing and deregulation, and I look forward to participating in another debate on this important subject in a year's time or a few years' time. We can then see all the extra progress that the Government have made in making the British economy more competitive.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor and Maidenhead): There has been much to admire in this morning's debate, although I fear that one cannot admire the guerrilla tactics of the Opposition some moments ago.

I enormously admired the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) brought up the subject. I also admire the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) managed to get in an advertisement for his new pamphlet, which, even at £10, remains excellent value.

[Mr. Michael Trend]

I enormously admired the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who made effective arguments that have sympathy throughout the House, in a way that no Opposition Member sought to do.

I shall speak about the first phrase of the motion:

> "To call attention to the need for the United Kingdom to be competitive" because that begs an important question and it needs broader consideration. Often, in discussion of the subject, people speak about the historical, cultural and social factors that are important, but those are not gone into in much depth. Yet I believe that those go to the heart of the matter.

We should ask ourselves what competition is. A fairly straightforward definition in "Johnson's", is the definition that begs the questions. In one sense, competition, as Bentham put it, was the way in which traders brought reduction in prices to purchasers, but there have been other usages of the word which betray characteristically English attitudes towards competition.

> "The action of endeavouring to gain what another endeavours to gain at the same time"

For a long time, there was an idea in our culture—I think that it persists—that competition was somehow ungentlemanly. It was to do with trade, which many people, of course, despised. There was suspicion of the examination system, which was the competition gateway. I am reminded that, in the past century, in the Indian civil service, people who had had to exert themselves to obtain work by engaging in the examination system were known as "competition-wallahs" and disregarded for that.

Why, though, did Britain, which had such pre-eminence in the field in the 19th century, decline? In an earlier intervention, I mentioned Gottfried Bruder, whose evidence to the Select Committee was second to none. He said:

> "Britain's early and long-held lead in industrialisation, the inventiveness and individualism of her people, their capacity for organisation, discipline and improvisation, virtues all of which were amply displayed for instance in the success of Empire, their wide knowledge of the world and high international repute, as well as a broad home market combined with a widely spread international trading base, make the industrial decline"—

I would argue that, in the past century and in much of this one, we have not been competitive. Because we had imperial preference, our traders were not as competitive as other countries quickly became. That phenomenon has been widely studied, particularly in a splendid book, which I will not bother the House with at the moment, by Mr. Martin Weiner, "English Culture and the Decline of the Industrial Spirit 1850-1980". Thought on the matter suggests that there was an English spirit abroad that denigrated and found trade distasteful—not in the milieu for finance, of course, as that was not at all different from the traditional world of the aristocracy and the then middle classes, who regarded it as a clean activity, done in a fashionable location. The roots of our present debate over the split between a financial culture and an industrial culture can be found to a certain extent in the past.

Much has changed in recent years, but there is still considerable room for further change. I give as an instance of that the status, say, of engineers, who are at the centre of our competitiveness in our industries. An engineer in Germany or Italy is somebody who is widely respected in the community and is always introduced as an engineer, in the way in which one would say, "Here is a doctor." In this country, an engineer is the person one sends for when one's washing machine breaks down. The status of engineers is a key measure of how seriously we take the manufacturing industry.

Many of our university graduates, I fear to say, come out of university having done extremely well in arts and sciences and choose to go into one of the professions or the City rather than industry. Although the situation has improved, it must improve much more before we are in the same position as Germany. A good arts graduate coming out of university today would still be very tempted to go into, say, the civil service, the cream of which, of course, are the Clerks of the House of Commons. If one put all that superb egg-head power together and applied it to British industry, no doubt the country would be 10 times more prosperous.

There was also a sense in the past that there was something almost immoral about competitiveness, that the mammon gospel of competitiveness was not somehow in accordance with the Christian message. A characteristically pragmatic English view was put on that by Arthur Hugh Clough in his new 10 commandments, "The Latest Decalogue", when he said:

> "Thou shalt not covet; but tradition > approves all forms of competition."

I come to a third usage of the word, in which competition is placed in opposition to co-operation. That is particularly found in the ideologies of the Left, where they pretend that competition and co-operation are two sides of the same coin, and that they cannot work together, as we would think. It is particularly true of Bertrand Russell, who said that one could have one or the other. Yet that is not the case. We believe very strongly that the ideological bias against competition still exists in the left of British politics. I shall give one example of that—education and training.

Many hon. Members have spoken today about training, but it really is a motherhood subject. Everybody approves of training, but what matters is how one does it. If we are to have a people who are more competitive and able to get away from the mental attitudes of the past, and compete more vigorously in the world markets, it must begin in the education system.

Where does Labour stand on this? Its attitude is nowhere more evident than in its lack of enthusiasm for competition. In the past 10 years, pressure on the examination system has come mainly from left-wing dominated unions and has been to try to get everybody to win prizes. It is viewed as disgraceful that some people should do better than others. Streaming in schools and especially in the big comprehensives has meant that there has been no encouragement for pupils to be competitive, one against the other. The idea in school sports that there should be no team or individual competitive spirit has been encouraged.

Rather than picking winners in education, Labour has encouraged a bland similarity throughout the system. It is against the assessment of teachers, which is a form of competition within the profession, and it does not approve of the competitive grading of schools. That distrust of league tables is at the heart of a profoundly uncompetitive attitude.

As I have said, some of the damage to our country stems from the attitude that competition is ungentlemanly and might be immoral. Some people on the Labour side of the debate think that competition is ideologically wrong and politically incorrect. If we are to be more competitive we must stick to the Government's policies as outlined in the White Paper.

In the world markets that are currently developing a new order of competition is coming into existence. I have the pleasure to be taking part in an Industry and Parliament Trust placement scheme with GKN which works successfully at the centre of the automotive industry. It has plants all over the world manufacturing constant velocity joints of which the company has a large share of the world market. Increasingly, its factories will be more competitive with each other. Whether we can produce those joints more competitively than the factories in Germany, Spain or Italy will be enormously important.

The Japanese car factories that have been set up in Britain are not British in any sense of the word, but they are producing jobs for us, which is what we want. Jobs are the reason for our need to be competitive in world markets. That is why education and training, business, exporting, turning away from high social on-costs and open markets matter. Our people will judge us on our success in increasing performance, and that can only be done by a party that understands how competition will develop in new world markets.

This is a wide-ranging subject and I fear that I have not been able to speak on it as expansively as I should have wished. I commend the Government's policy on competitiveness and congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his White Paper. I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye on the way in which she brought the subject to the House.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): We have had an interesting, high-quality and wide-ranging debate. I am sorry that not all my hon. Friends who wanted to contribute could be called. I am also rather sorry that I have much less time to respond to the debate than the time that the Opposition spokesman took for his speech.

I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) on her success in the ballot and most of all on her choice of subject. Competitiveness is the foundation on which our future prosperity has to be built and my hon. Friend was right to remind the House and the members of the Government, whichever Department we are in, that we must not forget it. I also congratulate her on the able way in which she moved the motion and on the many telling points that she made.

I congratulate all my hon. Friends on not only the quality of their speeches but the knowledge that they have displayed and the interest that they take in businesses, especially those in their constituencies.

I should like to reinforce what has been said about why competitiveness is so important. Business and industry are the main creators of wealth in our economy. They are the drivers of our economy, which is why I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) that there is no more important subject than business and industry for the House to debate. I am happy to agree with the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) that the subject is important. Business and industry are the foundations on which our other achievements are built—schools, hospitals, improvements in living standards and a better quality of life. We all wish for those things and business and industry generate the wealth to pay for such improvements in our lives. The competitiveness of business and industry is essential, therefore, for our future prosperity and vital if Britain is to be able to satisfy the social and economic aspirations of its citizens.

That goes as much, if not more, for the disabled as for other members of society. I take the strongest objection to the synthetic indignation and the Opposition's time-wasting during this important debate. I am astonished that they do not seem to be aware that, as often as not, the first motion on the Order Paper on a day such as this takes up the whole of that day. I can think of no subject that more justifies filling the day and not all my hon. Friends who could have made valuable speeches were able to speak. In those circumstances, it is astonishing that there has been a total absence of speeches from Opposition Members, apart from that of the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman. They have nothing to say about business, industry and wealth creation. That is equalled only by the performance of the Liberal Democrats, who have not only had nothing to say, but have not been present for the vast majority of this important debate.

Mr. Berry: The Minister will be aware that work on the second Severn crossing has ceased because more than 700 workers were sacked yesterday as a result of taking 24-hour industrial action after a ballot. Those workers want the matter to be referred to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, but the management has refused. Will the Minister use his best endeavours to ensure that investment in infrastructure in Bristol continues and that the matter is referred to ACAS for settlement as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Sainsbury: That intervention is an example of why I would be unwise, in the limited time available, to give way again. I want to respond to the important points made by those who have spoken in the debate.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye on the achievements of the 1980s—the progress on industrial relations, the gains of smaller and medium-sized companies and the improvement in managements' ability to manage, which is an important point. That is reflected in the new-found emphasis on exporting and quality. She rightly put the matter in the context of the global market in which we now compete. She and other hon. Members referred to the importance of service industries and the artificial distinctions that occur between the manufacturing sector and other industries.

As I have many language schools in my constituency, I was delighted to hear her reference to language schools. We all agree that London is a vital part of our economy and has a vital contribution to make. I have recently announced a grant in aid to the London First centre.

My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye drew attention to the disadvantages of an unstable macro economy, particularly in respect of investment. Unless we firmly control public spending, it is inevitable, as during the era to which my hon. Friend referred of Lord Healey, as he now is, that we shall be faced with macro-economic instability, which is damaging to our economy.

I was glad to hear what my hon. Friend said about improvements in export support. She referred to the roads to Hastings and my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North referred, rightly, to the importance of roads to Norwich. I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is aware of what my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye said.

[Mr. Sainsbury]

My hon. Friend brought her remarks to a close by saying that we must accept and welcome, rather than resist, change when it is necessary to improve competitiveness. I hope that we all agree about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) referred, understandably—he is a great expert on it—to the car industry. It is an industry transformed. It reflects all the benefits of the changes that we brought to the environment in which business operates during the 1980s, not least to inward investment. I was glad to hear the welcome that my hon. Friend expressed for the success that the BMW takeover of Rover is achieving. I noted what he said about trading standards officers. I shall ensure that his comments are followed up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) made some cogent remarks about banks. I will ensure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware of them. My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) talked about Devonport with great feeling. I know that we all regret the additional redundancies that have occurred there. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is made aware of what he had to say on the subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) commented on the changes in structure that are occurring in manufacturing employment and how the transfer, for instance, of transport can mean that somebody is reclassified as being in the service industry. Service industries and manufacturing industries are interlinked. The success of service industries makes an important contribution to the success of manufacturing industries. I thank my hon. Friend for what he said about my visit—I much enjoyed it—to his constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) spoke of the contribution that the disabled can make to our economy. I am sure that we all agree about that. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend with responsibility for the disabled is aware of what my hon. Friend said.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls)—

Mr. Alan Howarth: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sainsbury: Yes, but I ask my hon. Friend to make a brief intervention.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. It is extremely important that the economic Departments respond to the issue with proper seriousness and address themselves intelligently to the proposition that is before them. It is not something that will go away; it is a real issue. I am grateful that my right hon. Friend intends to draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for disabled people the remarks that I made this morning, but what I said was very much addressed to him and his ministerial colleagues.

Mr. Sainsbury: I take that point. I was present when my hon. Friend was speaking and my right hon. Friend was not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Mr. Trend), in a rather philosophical speech —perhaps appropriate from Windsor—talked about the importance of engineering and spoke of what more we should do to enhance the status of engineers in our society. I very much agree with him. I was glad to hear him applaud the importance of trade. He will not be surprised when I say that I entirely agree that trade should not be disregarded.

I move on to some more substantial points—well, not necessarily more substantial, but matters to which I can refer at slightly greater length. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye talked about support for business men who are helping to develop standards in Europe. That is important. We want to ensure that British business makes a full contribution to the development of those standards. If we do not, we can be sure that standards will be developed more to the advantage of industry elsewhere. For that reason, we have consulted on the matter. After listening carefully to the views of business, we concluded that we should contribute £7.3 million to the British Standards Institution and industry concerned with standards writing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye also suggested that there could be benefits in an exchange scheme between the home civil service and civil servants elsewhere in the European Union and the Commission. I very much agree with her. Indeed, there are regular interchanges of staff with the French, German and Irish civil services. Some 140 United Kingdom officials are currently seconded to the Commission.

In 1990, we introduced a special scheme of recruitment, training and postings designed to equip young United Kingdom graduates to take and pass the European institutions' examinations. Our ultimate objective is to increase the number of UK permanent officials in the Commission and in other European institutions. That is in addition to the Commission's scheme for the exchange of officials which was introduced in 1993.

I am sorry that time is running a little short, and I want now to consider the extremely important subject of deregulation. That subject was referred to by my hon. Friends the Members for Hastings and Rye, for Havant, for Surrey, North-West and for Eastbourne who quite rightly —and I have a constituency interest in this—put his point in the context of tourism.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye emphasised the value of goal setting, risk assessment and compliance-cost assessment with regard to the work of the Health and Safety Executive. I fully agree with her points. My noble Friend—or noble brother—Lord Sainsbury, through the work of the task forces which he superintended, has identified that as an important point.

It is clear that Conservative Members agree that over-regulation reduces competitiveness and impedes growth. As we all know, the lack of legislative time has in the past prevented many common-sense changes to primary legislation. As my hon. Friends have made clear, such changes would benefit businesses, charities and individuals. That is why we attach such importance to the deregulation order-making power included in the Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill which is now being considered in another place and why we find it so strange that, once again showing their disregard for the interests of business and the wealth-creating importance of business, the Opposition oppose that Bill. We believe that proper parliamentary scrutiny and other stringent safeguards have been built into the Bill. The cumulative effect of the changes that the Bill could bring about would improve competitiveness by releasing business from unnecessary bureaucratic burdens.

Many of my hon. Friends, and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central, mentioned the important subject of research and development. The so-called R and D scoreboard, which is sponsored by my Department's innovation unit, is published by Company Reporting Ltd. It is produced using individual company accounts and it helps to promote informed discussion between the industrial and financial communities and, more generally, informed discussion about the overall level of company R and D spend.

Like my hon. Friends, I welcome the increase in overall reported United Kingdom R and D spend which has increased by 9 per cent. to £7.1 billion in line with a similar rise in sales and profits. That is perhaps not altogether surprising because, as we all know and as Conservative Members recognise, it is from profits and retained profits that R and D and investment are likely to be financed.

Britain's performance compares very favourably with the world's top 200 companies which reported only a 3 per cent. rise in R and D spend, a 2 per cent. sales increase and a 3 per cent. fall in profits. There were particularly notable increases, for example in the pharmaceutical industry, where the increase was 19 per cent. Other sectors also performed particularly well. In engineering, the increase was 10 per cent. It was 29 per cent. in media and 23 per cent. in support service sectors.

Mr. Cousins: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sainsbury: Could it be brief, please?

Mr. Cousins: I find the Minister's complacency on that point absolutely unbelievable and very destructive of the interests of Britain. Is he not concerned that about a third of our expenditure on research and development occurs in one sector of industry only, pharmaceutical? Well done, pharmaceutical; what about the rest?

Mr. Sainsbury: If the hon. Gentleman had read the competitiveness White Paper, he would know that we are very far from complacent on the subject. I welcome the increase that we have seen and that we wish to continue in United Kingdom investment in research and development, but we will see that only if we provide a business-friendly environment and allow business to make profits with minimum regulation, which is the last environment that the Opposition's policies would provide.

The United Kingdom has 13 companies in the world's top 200 spending companies. To put that in perspective, there are 81 in the United States, 48 in Japan, 17 in France, and only 11 in Germany in the top 200. Our top company is Glaxo, the third highest spender in its sector in the world.

Of course, research and development is important, but it is just one aspect of the far wider process of innovation. The White Paper, which I commend to the hon. Gentleman —perhaps he will read it—underlines United Kingdom industry's need to improve in many sectors of management and innovation if it is to be globally competitive. That underlines the fact that we are by no means complacent on the subject. My Department's "Managing in the 90s" programme has already promoted and demonstrated aspects of best practice to more than 50,000 managers. Increasingly, business links will be the local providers of that programme, providing the service more locally and effectively than it has been provided in the past.

The White Paper also reinforces the Government's commitment that research and development support is directed at improving our competitiveness. Recent initiatives build on last year's White Paper on science, engineering and technology which, as the hon. Gentleman will know, was the first for a very long time. It focused all Government science and technology expenditure and the science-based Government Departments and Europe on the objective of improving industrial competitiveness and the quality of life.

Our research and development funding is concentrated on sectors in which it can make the greatest difference. One sector of particular need is technology. We are working to help industry, especially smaller firms, to gain access to, and make use of, existing technology from all sources as well as state-of-the-art technology supported by United Kingdom and European research and development programmes. We are expanding our overseas technology services to make sure that innovations, technologies and management practices developed elsewhere in the world are available to British industry through business links and local or national networks. We are working with research and technology organisations and regional and other bodies with technology interests to prepare them to provide effective technology services to business link customers as well as their existing members and clients.

It is by helping firms to achieve maximum benefit from the wealth of research and development funding in the United Kingdom that we are ensuring that the taxpayer gets better value for money, but it is primarily for industry to fund its own research and development. It spends 50 times what my Department does. The important role of Government is to create and to continue to create the right climate for the private sector to be prepared to invest more in research and development. That is the way to sustainable economic growth in the longer term.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sainsbury: I shall give way, but only briefly.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what would be most damaging of all to British industry would be to return to the trade union strife that we saw under the previous Labour Government? Not only have Labour Members stayed away from the debate, but the news tapes outside show that there are cracks in the show of unity among contenders for the Labour leadership. The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is recorded as saying that she wants a return to secondary picketing and to sweep away large chunks of the Government's trade union reforms.

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. It was just those attitudes and inflexibilities that acted as such a deterrent to management to invest and to carry out research and development.

I now refer to the single most important subject that has been touched upon by my hon. Friends, particularly my hon. Friends the Members for Norwich, North and for Havant. It features very largely in the White Paper, and that is education and training. Skills have never been more important for competitiveness, and that applies at all levels and in all sectors. The Government are committed to raising the levels of participation and attainment throughout education and training. We must develop the self-confidence and esteem of all pupils and students.

Much has already been achieved. The Government and their partners—employers, schools, colleges and, of course, students—are beginning to close the gap which has been referred to between our performance and that of the best of our competitors. But there is undoubtedly still much to do. The demanding national targets for education and training provide a valuable focus for that work, and we are better placed to meet the need than ever before.

I shall turn to an example in education. More than 70 per cent. of 16-year-olds now stay in full-time education, and well over 90 per cent. are in some form of education and training. More of our young people secure good GCSE and GCE A-level results than ever before. A record number —it is almost one in three compared with about one in eight in 1979—are now entering higher education, and we have the highest graduate output in Europe. At the same time, our training strategy—training is more the responsibility of industry, as education is more the responsibility of Government—is to provide better training to more people and with more employer involvement, which is so important.

Training and enterprise councils are delivering. They are creating better local training provision, helping local people and regenerating local economies. In a four-week period in 1993, 2.4 million employees received job-related training. That is 70 per cent. more than in a similar period in 1984—nine years earlier. In addition, between 1987 and 1993, the number of workers with qualifications at A-level or equivalent rose by 2.4 million to nearly half the total work force.

Six thousand employers are now committed to meeting the investors-in-people standard for training and the development of their employees to meet the business needs that they perceive for their businesses. To build on that success, promotion of that standard is to be intensified. In addition, I am glad to be able to tell the House that all Government Departments are carrying forward their own plans to become investors in people.

But as several of my hon. Friends have made clear, it remains absolutely vital that businesses continue sufficiently to invest in training because that is the way to take full advantage of the recovery that we have in our economy. It is welcome news that a survey showed that in April 1994, 86 per cent. of manufacturing firms expected to increase or maintain their investment in training.

For our part, the last Budget included support for new modern apprenticeships to help young people to gain vital technical and supervisory skills. Modern apprenticeships represent a serious and major reform of the training system and a major change from the old time-served apprenticeship approach. The aim is to increase the number of young people gaining NVQ level 3 qualifications through work-based training to more than 40,000 a year.

But it is important that sights in the field of education and training are raised still further. Skill needs are changing and the levels of skills required is steadily rising. As we look to the needs of the next century, we must recognise that our international competitors are hard at work raising the skill levels of their work force to what they see as being required in that century.

Engineering skills—my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead referred to this—underpin many sectors of industry. I believe that the engineering industry can offer a rewarding career to young people, but employers must make that clearer by demonstrating that they can and will utilise and reward engineering skills. They must do that if they are to persuade more young people—both boys and girls—to follow engineering as a career. The Government, the engineering profession and industry are promoting all levels of engineering careers in schools and working with industry to develop the qualifications needed to train those who enter engineering.

This autumn, we are introducing engineering bursaries, to encourage students with good A-levels to choose engineering degree courses. The White Paper on competitiveness announced a demanding and exciting agenda for action on education and training—I should really say further action on education and training. The White Paper measures build on existing policies and successes. In all, the new measures announced represent a Government commitment of more than £300 million in the three years to 1997-98.

On education, we are streamlining the national curriculum. The emphasis will be on the basics—English, mathematics and science—and there will be rigorous testing at the key stages to check on progress. I find it hard to understand how anyone who has any interest in the competitiveness of the wealth-creating parts of our economy could do anything other than support and approve that programme of rigorous testing.

We are giving more choice to young people, by developing vocational options for 14 to 16-year-olds. They can provide motivation for pupils who might have become disenchanted with the conventional academic curriculum —we all recognise that there are bound to be some. Those options will complement more academic work, but I stress that they will not be a soft option. They will also be rigorously assessed, to ensure that they are comparable with more academic courses.

In 1995, we will introduce the new general diploma for young people, to acknowledge achievement in English, mathematics and science, plus two other subjects or their vocational equivalents. That will provide employers and others with a quality check that young people have mastered the basics.

We are also developing a head teachers' leadership and management programme; it is nicknamed Headlamp, but I would not want to minimise its importance in any way. Head teachers have to provide the lead and it is important that they have the quality and commitment and that they cultivate the right ethos and seek support from parents, employers and others in the community.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sainsbury: Very briefly, as we are running out of time.

Mr. Thompson: My right hon. Friend will recall that in my speech I called for something further—a staff college for head teachers. I hope that he will pass that call on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education.

Mr. Sainsbury: That is a very good point. Nearly all my right hon. Friends will have to read the entire debate to pick up the various excellent suggestions that have been made.

On careers guidance, which is another important matter, even without the passport of the general diploma, a clear map of the way ahead is vital for young people. That is why we are improving careers education and independent guidance to help young people to make the right choices.

Mr. Austin-Walker rose—

Mr. Sainsbury: I cannot give way as there is too little time left.

As part of that programme, we will invest £87 million in the next three years to enable the careers service to offer earlier and better independent advice to every young person at 13, 15 and 17. The amount of careers guidance, in schools and colleges will nearly double by 1997 and all pupils will receive a statement of entitlement to careers education guidance, and careers officers and teachers will receive extra training.

At the same time, the framework of academic and vocational qualifications post-16 needs to be challenging and attractive. It must enable young people to make the most of their abilities and aptitudes. The White Paper on competitiveness pledged us to strengthen further post-16 qualifications. As part of that process, I welcome the progress made by GCE examining boards towards adopting a code of practice for GCE A-level and AS-level exams. The broadly occupational GNVQs are already proving popular, I am happy to say. The National Council for Vocational Qualifications is reviewing the consistency of standards of rigour across the board.

I should like to say a lot more about education and on a number of other subjects of great importance. I hope that what I have already said about education and training will have made clear to the House the Government's commitment to, and recognition of, the importance of the subject to the competitiveness of British industry. Clearly it is a recognition which is shared by my hon. Friends. Another very important subject to which I should have liked to be able to reply is the importance of inward investment, which has made such a contribution to the success of our economy. My hon. Friends the Members for Havant, for Sutton and for Meriden referred to that issue. There are a number of other points on which I will try to write to my hon. Friends, if I have not already responded to them.

The debate has covered a wide range of issues, and it has one simple message: if business and industry are to succeed, they must be competitive. They must provide customers with the products they want at the price they want, of the right quality and service and at the right time. The Government have a role in achieving that objective and my Department's goal is simple: to help British business compete successfully at home, in the rest of Europe and throughout the world. That is a long-term aim which is shared by the whole of the Government—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business), the Speaker shall—

(1) at the sitting on Monday 20th June, put the Question on the Motion in the name of Mr. Secretary Heseltine relating to the draft Insurance Companies (Third Insurance Directives) Regulations 1994 not later than one and a half hours after it has been entered upon; and the said Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, after Ten o'clock; and

(2) at the sitting on Monday 27th June, put the Questions on the Motions in the name of Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew relating to the draft Ports (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 and the draft Ports (Northern Ireland Consequential Provisions) Order 1994 not later than Seven o'clock.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Personal Pension Schemes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The decision to privatise pensions was the worst and most damaging taken by the Government in the 1980s. It is significant that the Ministers involved are now the Prime Minister, the Leader of the House and the retiring Chairman of the Conservative party. As many as 3 million people have been cheated and defrauded as a result of their actions.Yesterday in the House I vainly tried to raise the subject and to get some kind of intelligent response from the Prime Minister commensurate with the enormity of the scandal. Sadly, although I gave the Prime Minister 24 hours' notice of my intention to raise the matter—as he requested on Tuesday—in the hope that that would mean that the response would be reasonable, all I had back was an answer as vacuous, patronising and insulting as most parliamentary answers are. I was delighted to see that The Times was equally dismissive of it today.

Although I do not want to waste the debate on futile party political points, I must say that it is a great shame that the Conservative party has not realised the damage that it has done through the decision that was taken in 1986. Our debate on the same subject in March which was disfigured by the contributions of a large number of speakers who confessed that they had financial interests in the pensions industry. At times it seemed as if they were speaking not on behalf of their constituents, but on behalf of their outside financial interests. That is one of the problems with our democracy, because I have no recollection of the Prudential party or Norwich Union party winning a seat at the election. It is wrong when the Chamber is abused by various commercial interests, as happened on that occasion.

It is almost impossible to exaggerate the damage that has been done by the Government's decision. Coopers and Lybrand claim that 2.4 million people should not have contracted out of state earnings-related pension scheme, SERPS, into the scheme. A further 500,000 people also contracted out, as a result of the most wickedly deceitful sales techniques, from the miners' scheme, the hospital scheme and other splendid occupational schemes. It is the worst financial scandal in Britain since the South Sea bubble and it has cost the national insurance scheme £10.5 billion. It is a mess of oceanic proportions.

I want to highlight certain points that have not received a great deal of attention in the past—some of them have received hardly any attention. There is a problem in understanding what a personal pension is, because the concept of a pension is the concept of a sum of money built up into a fund from which people can draw for the last years of their lives: A personal pension is a money purchase amount, which will then buy an annuity which, in turn, will determine the level of the pension.

It is tempting to conclude that the personal pension plan introduced by the Government was a dry run for the national lottery. In effect, that is what it is. It is a gamble. The pensions are as personal as a can of baked beans. They are not portable, as the Government said they would be and they can be changed only at enormous cost. The ultimate pension is in the lap of the gods. Recent events have shown that people are likely to lose out a great deal from such a scheme.

One iniquitous practice is conducted by a well-known company, Prudential. In common with most of us when we sign forms, people sign that company's form between the two little crosses without noticing the declaration on the form, which states:

> "I declare that the Prudential (or any of its authorised representatives) has not advised me to transfer my existing pension arrangement".

That form was in use as long ago as 1992. What on earth is the point of that declaration? Why were people asked to sign it unless the company knew that it was acting against the best interests of its customers? That declaration absolves the company from any future claims that people were wrongly advised. People take such advice because they are not self-motivated. They take out a pension on the advice of an expert—the man or woman who comes along and persuades them to buy it.

Even if a personal pension seems to be a good buy, things can go horribly wrong as retirement approaches. First, a downturn in the stock exchange market could reduce the value of the lump sum. Secondly, as has happened recently, a fall in the annuity rate reduces the amount of pension that a given sum will buy.

An annual survey of personal pensions in Money Management shows that the lump sum resulting from a £200 per month payment for 10 years into a Norwich Union with-profits scheme was 14.5 per cent. lower for a person reaching pension age in 1992 than for someone who reached it a year earlier. That represents an enormous drop in a short time. By mid-1993, the pension was more than 20 per cent. lower than that paid in 1991. For someone becoming a pensioner in 1993 rather than in 1991 the amount of money available to buy a pension was reduced by one fifth.

For anyone forced to buy a pension immediately after the October 1987 stock market crash, the loss was even greater. There is no way in which to escape that loss. For someone on a minute disposable income, a loss of between one quarter and one fifth of the income from a pension is catastrophic.

Another risk is that annuity rates will drop, which will have an even more serious effect on the value of pensions. In the four years to March 1994, Norwich Union's annuity rates fell by 31.8 per cent. for men aged 65, and by 36.7 per cent. for women aged 60. It is hard to imagine such a drop in the value of pensions. Hon. Members moan ceaselessly about what is happening to the value of basic pensions, but the falls in annuity rates have happened regardless of inflation and people are unaware of them. Even if the lump sum provided by the scheme had come up to expectations, the pension would still have been a third lower than that.

I do not wish to concentrate on a single company, so have looked at a range of companies. From details published recently by Pensions World magazine, I have calculated, without bias, the four best annuity rates quoted by life offices between 1990 and 1994. The table shows what the monthly pension from a £1,000 lump sum would have brought for a man retiring at the age of 60 or 65. In 1990, he would have received £146.05 but, by 1994, the same sum would have given him only £107.40. For a woman, the drop is from £127 to £87.67.

The Minister may say that gainers as well as losers are possible and that we are going through a bad patch. But no one could have anticipated the catastrophic fall in the past four years. When people enter the personal pensions market, they are expected to take decisions on their pensions in 20, 30 or 40 years' time and not a soul, however wise he or she may be, knows what will happen in that period. The collapse could be even worse. Now that legislation on this matter is looming, will the Minister say how many people are still buying pensions? I gather that 100,000 people bought personal pensions in the first quarter of this year. I should have imagined that personal pensions would now be seen as suspect and that no one would want to buy them. Are those now buying them aware of the drop in annuity values in the past four years? Do they realise what an atrociously poor buy they are, based not on speculation but on recent experience?

I wish to raise many other factors that have received little attention. This country has a problem with the role of financial advisers. There is a great number of them, and the public think that they give entirely disinterested advice. Sadly, that is not always the case. Unless the financial adviser is of a saintly disposition, he or she is more likely to sell policies that provide large commissions than policies that give good value to the customer, because the whole business is commission-driven.

Although the Government understand that all the 6 million people who have opted out of SERPS will be obliged to come back into the scheme at a certain time, the process is extremely slow. An expert has estimated that at least 1 million people who should have been advised to go back into SERPS are still outside it. I have spoken to some of the more reputable companies on that matter and been told that, although they have advised people to go back into SERPS, those amount to only a tiny number and that about 1 million people are, against their financial interests, still paying into personal pension schemes whereas they should go back into the state scheme.

There is a group of people known as, "the orphans". Unfortunately, there are a great many of them. Those are people who bought personal pension schemes through intermediaries—the agents and financial advisers—who have subsequently gone out of business. No one is left to advise those people when to return to the state earnings-related pension scheme. It should be the responsibility of the insurance company or another provider to give them that advice, but no one has pronounced on that subject.

Low earners especially risk being forced to take their pension at the wrong time. That is because people in a high-income job can often choose the date of their retirement. The lower one is on the ladder—the lower one's wages are—the less likely one is to be able to name such a date.

In Britain, insurance companies can market rotten pension schemes—and many schemes are rotten—with no control other than the Inland Revenue rules, which have nothing to do with value for money. I understand that in Germany, there are controls over financial products at the design stage. One is not allowed to market a scheme that is a rip-off. Such rules are needed here. I hope that in the forthcoming legislation there will be clear definitions of the types of schemes that can be marketed.

People who buy policies directly from providers are charged the same premiums as those who buy through intermediaries. Thus, although no commission is paid on a direct sale by the insurance company, the customer nevertheless has to pay a price that includes commission.

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

That should be illegal. Financial advisers would strongly oppose that because it would cut out their middle man's cut of the profit, but people should be encouraged to shop around.

There has recently been an improvement in the insurance market, with companies selling directly to the public. One company has provided policies of enormously greater value than the policies that were previously available. It is not possible to do that with pensions; it is not possible to cut out the intermediary, lose the commission and gain advantages by going directly to the company. It should be done. That is a reform which should be made.

Personal pensions have been a sad business. I cannot over-emphasise the number of tragedies that have resulted or the amount of anxiety that people feel. I doubt whether one person in 1,000 understands precisely the nature of the policy that he or she buys, and I have noticed that that is true among people of great education in the House who, when I discuss the subject with them, immediately bring the subject round to their personal policies.

We tend to trust the person who sells us a pension policy. We do not buy our cars or our houses in that way. In a lifetime, we might buy half a dozen cars and two or three homes, but, before we do so, we want experts to give us advice. We want the surveyors to look round the house. Yet we buy our pensions once only. We make a decision that will determine our income for possibly a quarter of our lives—it might even be longer—and we respect those salespeople as though they were disinterested in themselves and were giving us independent advice. The sad truth is that many of those people do not deserve that trust. Although they wear pinstripe suits, they should be treated with the same suspicion with which we treat double glazing salesmen or timeshare salesmen.

I suggest to the Minister that we need a genuinely independent financial advice agency, from which people could obtain advice for a small fee. I think that when the change takes place in personal pensions—when the Act comes into force—many financial advisers will lose their jobs. Those people could run such an institution. At the moment, however, people are at a loss to know where on earth they can obtain independent financial advice in circumstances in which the person who advises them does not have a vested interest in selling them a policy that offers the greatest commission.

We have gone back to the days when Beveridge said that a national insurance scheme was necessary. He felt that having people knocking on our doors and selling policies and collecting 2s 6d a week from our parents was a grossly inefficient system, in which 50 per cent. of the premium went towards commission and administration charges and was lost. That is why Beveridge wanted a national scheme. We have a national scheme in which only 5 per cent. of the costs go in administration, yet we are bribing people to desert it and go into private schemes, where 50 per cent. of the costs, again, go in commission and administration. It is wildly inefficient system.

I look forward to hearing the Minister give a positive answer—I gave him notice of what I intend to raise today—and whether he will approve the idea of setting up an independent finance advice agency, which would separate the sales part of the pensions industry from the part that makes the commissions. That, above all, is needed.

2.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. William Hague): The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) has often raised this subject in the House, although he has raised a number of new aspects today. I will certainly seek to respond to the points that he raised. He did, indeed, give me notice about an hour ago of some of the things that he intended to say, just as he notified the Prime Minister of his question yesterday. After having open government, we have the hon. Gentleman practising open opposition. I congratulate him on that innovation.

Before I respond to specific points, I shall say a few words about the general background to the issue. Personal pensions are an important part of the Government's strategy for ensuring a continued improvement in the general level of post-retirement income. The means by which we are pursuing that objective are to widen choice, to encourage more people to plan for their retirement income, and to build a solid base of funded pension provision for the future. Widespread and successful occupational pension provision is vital to those objectives, but so is the availability and success of personal pensions.

Before our reforms of pension law in the 1980s, the state and employers had more say over how individuals could save for their own retirement than did the individuals. Employers could require people to join their scheme as a condition of employment—even against the individual's will. Where no employer's scheme was available, the state obliged people to contribute to SERPS. We changed that in the 1980s. We ended compulsory membership of any particular scheme. We gave people the opportunity to choose a pension for themselves. Now everyone can plan for the pension that best suits their needs, whether it be state or non-state, occupational or personal.

By widening choice, our intention, in which we have succeeded, is to encourage more people to save for their retirement. Growth in personal pensions has brought dramatic growth in personal investment—something which the hon. Gentleman did not mention, but which we should remember in a debate of this kind. In 1988, individuals and their employers contributed £260 million to personal pensions. By last year, those contributions had increased nearly 10 times to £2.5 billion. Of the 5 million people who have taken out a personal pension in place of SERPS, more than 40 per cent. are making contributions on top of those received from the Department of Social Security to boost their income in retirement. That is new money being invested to provide extra security in old age —money that could not have been paid into SERPS.

As the hon. Gentleman well knows, SERPS operates on a pay-as-you-go basis. The money paid in today is also paid out today, to current pensioners. Nothing is saved. Nothing is invested. As the number of pensioners increases in the next century, the burden on those making contributions will be heavier. That is why we want to encourage more funded pension provision, where money paid in today is invested for the future. Not only does that create a flow of funds for investment in British industry now; it provides a sustainable means of providing pensions for the future.

That is the general background. I will deal now with the allegations of mis-selling of pension transfers and with some of the specific points that the hon. Gentleman raised. Choosing a pension will be one of the most important financial decisions that most people will ever make. And however people choose to save for their retirement, it is essential that their pension rights should be secure. With personal pensions, that means that people must have access to the information that they need to make an informed choice. They must be able to rely on the highest standards of expert advice,and they must be able to have confidence that the regulatory framework will protect their interests against the unscrupulous and the incompetent.

When the Securities and Investments Board recently reported evidence of poor compliance with rules governing the sale of personal pensions to people transferring from employers' schemes, the Government made the position clear. Concerns about compliance must be investigated fully, the extent of any mis-selling must be determined and anyone whose pension rights have been jeopardised must be provided with a remedy. As the hon. Member will know, the Securities and Investments Board is currently conducting a major investigation into pension transfers. The board has already acted to prevent and deter any further mis-selling and new guidance has been published designed to raise the standards of future transfer business.

From next month, any financial adviser advocating a transfer from an occupational scheme to a personal pension will have to provide the client with a written statement explaining why the recommendation is suitable. Advisers will have to undertake computerised comparisons of the benefits offered by the occupational and personal schemes, a so-called "transfer value analysis", and supply the results to the customer. Where a client wants to proceed with a transfer against advice, regulators will require evidence that attempts to counsel the customer have been made. From November, if advisers want to undertake transfer business they will have to demonstrate special competence in pensions advice or have their work double checked, and any firm wishing to undertake pension transfer business will be obliged to notify the regulators. Those firms will be subject to special monitoring.

These measures represent a solid step to improve the marketing of personal pensions and to safeguard the interests of the potential investor. In the next few weeks, the Securities and Investments Board will complete its investigations into past mis-selling and we expect a full report. The board will tell personal pension providers and independent intermediaries how they should review pension transfer business and assess compliance with regulators' rules. It will provide guidance on how firms should contact their clients and it will lay down a framework for providing redress to investors who may have been mis-sold a personal pension and suffered disadvantage as a result.

I can therefore repeat the reassurance offered to personal pension investors by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State a few weeks ago. No investor need be alarmed; nor should investors take precipitate action. If investors have any questions about their scheme, they should contact their personal pension provider.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a particular firm which included disclaimers in its contracts. I cannot comment on allegations against a specific firm. All authorised companies are bound by the regulators' rules on selling personal pensions, and any evidence of malpractice should be referred to the relevant regulator. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the regulators will treat with lively scepticism claims by firms that personal pensions have been sold without advice. They will expect all such claims to be backed by credible evidence that the customer genuinely asked for a transaction to go ahead without taking advice from the firm.

As I have said, the Securities and Investments Board published guidance on future pension transfers in May. That set out new guidelines for firms on "execution only" business as it is called. That is defined as a transaction where the customer simply gives his order and does not rely on the firm to advise him about the merits of the transaction or its suitability for him. The board considers that such transactions are likely to be unusual where there has been personal contact or correspondence between the individual and an intermediary. The guidance advises firms carefully to consider their position before classifying a transaction as execution only, and a customer's signature on a standard form may not be regarded as conclusive evidence of a transaction's execution only status. All firms should bear that in mind.

When the hon. Gentleman asked about annuity rates he raised an important point and drew attention to a difficulty that people experience when turning their personal pension rights into an annuity. Of course annuity rates simply reflect market conditions. Interest rates and inflation have fallen over the period that the hon. Gentleman described, and in that time annuity rates have also fallen. The key to preserving the purchasing power of annuities is the maintenance of tight control of inflation. Between 1990 and 1994, annuity rates fell, on average, by about 25 per cent. Inflation and interest rates fell by more than that, and providers would be entitled to point out that annuity rates in 1990 and surrounding years would have been unusually high—much higher than they might normally have been. The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point and the Government are aware that individuals would like more flexibility over the timing of their annuity purchases. We are committed to developing proposals that will enhance flexibility without jeopardising security in retirement. In developing those proposals, we will bear in mind the important points that the hon. Gentleman made.

I turn briefly to the alleged mis-selling of appropriate personal pensions, which allow people to opt out of SERPS. The Securities and Investments Board's current investigation relates to the sale of personal pensions to people leaving occupational schemes; it does not address the sale of personal pensions in place of SERPS. The chairman of the SIB has indicated that he has no evidence of systematic non-compliance with selling practice rules in this area, but that the SIB will nevertheless review sales of appropriate personal pensions in due course. In the meantime, we must not exaggerate the possible scale of the problem. The hon. Gentleman referred to a Coopers and Lybrand report, but he is aware that Coopers and Lybrand has asked people not to read too much into its figures and not to exaggerate the scale of the problem. Once again, we shall expect the SIB to investigate the matter thoroughly. Mis-selling which has caused harm to investors must be identified and those responsible for providing bad advice must provide suitable redress.

[Mr. William Hague]

The hon. Gentleman asked about information. The Government are committed to giving people access to information about personal pensions. We want consumers to make informed choices. That means not only firm regulation but the new rules, which the Chancellor has directed the SIB to produce, governing the disclosure of charges and commissions are important. These will come into effect next month. In future, illustrations of personal pension benefits must reflect the actual charges levied by a provider—.

The motion having been made after half-past Two o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 23 May 1994

PRIME MINISTER

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 5 May, Official Report, column 614, what was the cost of calls made on (a) car and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

The Prime Minister: Total call charges in the year 1993-94 for (a) car telephones were £2,021 and (b) portable telephones were £4,570.

The total cost of the equipment was approximately £6,700. There are no maintenance charges for the year 1993-94.

Duchy of Cornwall

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will enter discussions with the Prince of Wales with a view to seeking agreement to increase the voluntary contribution to the Exchequer from the Duchy of Cornwall from 25 per cent. of income to 40 per cent.

The Prime Minister: No. As explained in the report of the royal trustees dated 11 February 1993 (HC464) the Prince of Wales stopped making voluntary contributions to the Exchequer in April 1993. Instead he voluntarily agreed to pay income tax on his personal income in the same way as other taxpayers.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Prime Minister what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Office as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

The Prime Minister: None.

Second World War Commemorations

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to be able to reply to the letter sent to him in April by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, about help for war-disabled ex-service men and women and war widows to mark the 50th anniversary of D-day.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the right hon. Member's letter shortly.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if it is intended, as part of the 50th anniversary events next year to commemorate the end of the last war, to include an exhibition on the crimes committed by Italian fascists.

The Prime Minister: We have no such plans.

Parliamentary Private Secretaries

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the current list of parliamentary private secretaries and the Ministers to whom each is attached.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Small Claims Court

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the agencies which supply free assistance and legal advice to those people who wish to pursue claims through the small claims court.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information is not kept centrally. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux issues a list of all individual bureaux in England and Wales but this is being reprinted and will not be available until mid-June. In addition, advice and assistance is provided by law centres and other advice agencies in England and Wales, which are free to decide which kinds of problems to cover.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what qualifications lay representatives will be required to possess before they can represent plaintiffs in the small claims court as set out in the consultation paper "Small Personal Injury Claims"; and from which professions they will be drawn.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lay Representatives (Rights of Audience) Order 1992 allows litigants a free choice of representative to help them pursue or defend their case in court. It is a matter for the litigants themselves whom they choose. Lay representatives are required to act in an honest, reasonable and responsible manner; if they fail to do so the court may withdraw their right of audience.

Personal Injury Cases

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what experience or professional qualifications are required of those people who work in agencies providing free legal advice on personal injury cases.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Individual agencies are best placed to decide the level of skills and training required. At present, only solicitors are able to obtain payment from the legal aid fund for advice given. However, the Legal Aid Board is currently working with the advice sector to define quality assurance standards for advice and assistance in areas of social welfare law. This would enable non-solicitors in agencies meeting these standards to deliver advice and assistance through the legal aid scheme. At present there are no plans to extend this to personal injury cases.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the average sum of money awarded in those personal injury cases heard in county courts in each year since 1990.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Based on sample surveys, the estimated average value of monetary awards for personal injury cases disposed of by trial at county courts in each year from 1990 to 1993 inclusive is £3,100, £3,700, £4,500 and £7,300 respectively. Corresponding figures relating to cases disposed of by arbitration are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) how many malpractice claims have been brought against general practitioners for failing to diagnose correctly the severity of personal injury for each year since 1990;

(2) how many general practitioners have been disciplined as a result of a malpractice claim brought against them for failing to diagnose the severity of a personal injury for each year since 1990.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information is not held centrally by the Lord Chancellor's Department and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

District Judges

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what were the average number of cases heard and the average hours worked by a district judge in each year since 1990.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Based on sample surveys, the estimated average number of cases disposed of by trial at county courts per district judge in each year from 1990 to 1993 inclusive is 18, 24, 28 and 24 respectively. Only a small part of a district judge's time is spent on trial work but corresponding figures relating to cases disposed of by arbitration and the information requested on average hours worked are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Belmarsh Magistrates Court

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on what date Belmarsh magistrates court opened; on how many occasions there has been a sitting on each weekday since the opening; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Belmarsh court complex was officially opened on 21 January 1994. The magistrates court sat for the first time on 14 March 1994. Information about the numbers of sittings is not yet available centrally.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Richards: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement about equal opportunities for women and people of ethnic minority origin in relation to appointments to the professional judiciary in England and Wales.

Mr. John M. Taylor: In July last year, the Lord Chancellor announced a programme aimed at developing further the current procedures for judicial appointments, including measures to encourage applications by women and ethnic minority practitioners. In carrying out his responsibilities for the appointment of judges, the Lord Chancellor has always supported the principle of equality of opportunity and will continue to do so; the Lord Chancellor does not discriminate on grounds of gender or ethnic origin.

The Lord Chancellor sets high standards for appointments to judicial office; those appointed are selected on merit from suitably qualified candidates. The Lord Chancellor seeks to ensure that every possible step is taken to treat fairly those who apply for judicial office and that decisions are based on an assessment of suitability which is as objective as possible.

The Lord Chancellor welcomes and encourages applications from all suitably qualified legal practitioners, including women and practitioners of ethnic minority origin.

The Lord Chancellor is carrying forward his commitment to equality of opportunity in judicial appointments in the following ways:

1. Continuing to encourage women and ethnic minority practitioners to apply for judicial appointment by:—
    - (i) promoting awareness of opportunities for judicial appointments for women and people of ethnic minority origin among senior members of the judiciary and the profession and inviting them to encourage suitably qualified women and people of ethnic minority origin to apply; and
    - (ii) publicising the opportunities for all to apply for judicial appointments in speeches, at meetings and by other suitable means;
2. Applying age limits for judicial appointments flexibly in the case of practitioners who take a career break or who start their professional career late;
3. Conducting reviews of all ethnic minority and female applicants for judicial appointment from time to time to ensure that suitable candidates from these groups are properly considered;
4. Ensuring that women and ethnic minority candidates are included, wherever possible, among those under consideration for particular posts;
5. Providing opportunities for familiarisation with the work involved in a judicial post for prospective applicants where appropriate;
6. Taking due account of the domestic circumstances of individuals concerned wherever possible when making appointments to particular geographical locations;
7. Recording the number of female and ethnic minority members of the full-time and part-time judiciary and taking steps to improve the information about the ethnic origin of serving office holders and applicants for judicial appointment;
8. Arranging for an official in the judicial appointment group in my Department to:—
    - (i) act as a liaison point with others about equal opportunities matters in relation to judicial appointments; and
    - (ii) advise on policies in this field;
9. Undertaking to keep this programme under review in the light of general developments in the field of equal opportunities and in accordance with any changes in the procedures for judicial appointments.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Ordination of Women

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the names of the individuals and the amounts of award made to them under section 5 of the Ordination of Women (Financial Provisions) Measure 1994.

Mr. Alison: I have consulted the Pensions Board, which is concerned in the administration of this matter and shares the commissioners' view that it is not appropriate to publish details of support offered to particular individuals. Eight awards of varying amounts have been made to date under this section, depending on individual circumstances.

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the names of individuals and the amounts of award made to them under section 1 of the Ordination of Women (Financial Provisions) Measure 1994.

Mr. Alison: I refer the hon. Member to my previous answer. Awards have been made under this section to 118 individuals.

Estates Commission (Pensions)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, who is drawing pensions after holding the offices of the First and Third Estates Commissioner, and of what amounts; on what basis the rate of pensions is calculated; and how many contributory years are required for a full plan.

Mr. Alison: The basis of calculation of the pensions payable to retired Church Estates Commissioners is set out in section 20 of the Church Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Measure, 1960, which contains the following provisions:

> (1) The Commissioners shall have power to grant to any First Church Estates Commissioner or Third Church Estates Commissioner who retires from from service as such a Commissioner—
> (a) if he has performed not less than fifteen years pensionable service, a pension of such amount as the Commissioners may determine not exceeding two-thirds of the salary to which he was entitled under section 9 of the Ecclesiastical Commissioner (Powers) Measure 1938 immediately before retirement;
> (b) if he has performed less than fifteen years but not less than five years pensionable service, a pension of such amount as the Commissioners may determine, being an amount not exceeding the aggregate of one thrid of the salary to which he was so entitled and one thirtieth of that salary of each completed year of pensionable service in excess of five;
> (c) if he has performed less than five years pensionable service but retires by reason of permanent disability for the performance of the duties of his office, a pension of such amount as the Commissioners may determine not exceeding one-third of the salary to which he was so entitled; > and a pension under this subjection shall be payable for the remainder of the life to whom it is granted.
> In determining the amount of the pension, if any, to be granted to a person under this subsection the Commissioners shall have regard to any superannuation benefits to which he may be entitled in respect of any other service performed by him before his pensionable service began.

No lump sum is payable on retirement other than by commutation, nor is there provision for a widow's or widower's pension, other than by allocation of pension.

Four pensions are currently in payment at a total cost in 1993 of £84,000. It is not the commissioners' practice to publish details of payments made to particular individuals.

TREASURY

Third-world Debt

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the Government's most recent proposals to reduce third-world debt.

Mr. Nelson: As a result of an initiative launched by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in 1990, the Paris Club of international creditor Governments now offers concessional rescheduling of the official bilateral debts of the poorest and most indebted countries. Such concessional reschedulings are known as Trinidad terms.

Under present arrangements, 50 per cent. of the eligible debts falling due over the course of an IMF economic adjustment programme are written off. In addition, the creditors undertake to consider writing off 50 per cent. of the whole stock of debt if the debtor maintains a good record with both its debt service and IMF programme. To date, 22 countries have benefited from Trinidad terms. Over the lifetime of these agreements more than $7 billion-worth of debt will be restructured and some $2 billion-worth of debt forgiven.

While these agreements represent a substantial achievement, the United Kingdom considers that more could be done to help the poorest and most indebted countries. We are thus pressing our fellow Paris Club creditors to improve the existing Trinidad terms. In particular, we hope that they will agree to give debt reduction along the lines of the Prime Minister's original proposal. This would mean: an immediate stock of debt reduction for countries which have edstablished a track record of reform under an IMF adjustment programme; and increasing the level of debt and debt service relief, from 50 per cent. to some two-thirds on average and up to 80 per cent. for the most deserving countries on a case-by-case basis; Last July, the Tokyo summit of G7 Heads of Government backed the United Kingdom's proposals for earlier stock of debt reductions. Despite this, negotiations within the Paris Club are proceeding slowly.

Economic and Finance Council

Mr. Simon Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the most recent Council meeting of European Economic and Finance Ministers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Economic and Finance Council of the European Union—ECOFIN—met in Brussels on 16 May. I represented the United Kingdom.

We discussed the economic situation in the European Union on the basis of the Commission's latest forecasts and in the context of preparing to revise the broad economic guidelines. Overall, the Commission's forecasts were more optimistic than its previous ones, although it emphasised the need for action on budget deficits. I welcomed the Commission's acknowledgement of the improvement in United Kingdom unemployment and the measures to consolidate the United Kingdom's public finances. But I felt that the Commission was too pessimistic on the United Kingdom growth and inflation outlook. I stated that the United Kingdom was well on the way to sustained growth and low inflation. There was a presentation of the Commission's annual report on fraud and of its anti-fraud strategy, which will be discussed in greater detail at a later Council.

The Council discussed the follow-up to the conclusions of the Brussels European Council on the Commission's White Paper, "Growth, Competitiveness and Employment". President Delors gave a presentation of the Commission's latest progress report. I supported a German proposal to establish a deregulation "commission" of experts to increase the pace of deregulation and the removal of unnecessary burdents on businesses. I also spoke about the need for the June ECOFIN to send clear conclusions to the Corfu European Council, and said that there was no need for new Community instruments to finance trans-European networks.

There was also discussion of financial assistance to countries in central and eastern Europe. Political agreement was reached on loans to Moldova and Romania for balance of payments support, and the Council confirmed a loan to Bulgaria. The Council deferred discussion of a grant to Albania and an additional loan to Bulgaria.

There were no formal votes on issues discussed at the Council.

Inheritance Tax

Dr. Strang: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures the Government have put in place to ensure that agricultural land giving qualification to inheritance tax relief at 100 per cent. is not being purchased as a means of avoiding inheritance tax relief at 40 per cent.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 19 May 1994]: Qualifying farm land has normally to be owned and farmed by the owner for at least two years before a transfer in order to obtain 100 per cent. relief. This requirement targets the relief at working farms and ensures that speculative investors in land dealing companies do not benefit.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Private Security Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 383, if he will publish in the Official Report the information which his Department is collating about the extent of the use of private security firms when it is available.

Mr. Michael Howard: Yes.

Immigration

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provisions of national law are applied as regards the authorisation of family members of Turkish workers to join the worker for the purposes of article 7 of association Council Decision 1/80 concluded in accordance with the Turkey EC association agreement of 1963.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Those contained in paragraph 46 of the Immigration Rules (HC 251).

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been implemented to give effect to article 10(2) of regulation 1612/68 EC to facilitate the admission of family members not coming within article 10(1) of the regulation but who are dependent on, or lived under the same roof in the country from whence they come, as migrant workers citizens of the Union and to favour the admission of such family members under article 1(2) of directive 73/148 EC.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Regulation 1612/68 has direct effect in United Kingdom law and does not need to be implemented separately. Article 1(2) of Directive 73/148, does not require specific implementation as it is not concerned with a Community entitlement. However, in accordance with the provisions of article 1(2) favourable consideration is given to allowing the admission of those family members who have no other entitlement to join a European economic area national resident in the United Kingdom on whom they are dependent.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the distinction between social assistance and social security as those terms are used in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994.

Mr. Charles Wardle: "Social assistance" is the term used in article 1 of directives 90/364/EEC—the general right of residence—and 93/96/EEC—the right of residence for students—whereas directive 90/365/EEC—the right of residence for employees and self-employed persons who have ceased their occupational activity—uses the term "social security" in article 1.

"Social security" means statutory schemes, whether contributory or non-contributory, which are designed to meet the specific contingencies listed in article 4(1) of regulation (EEC) No. 1408/71 on social security or migrant workers. The term "social assistance" is not defined in EC law but is generally interpreted as covering non-contributory schemes which are often means-tested and/or based on need.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 May, Official Report, columns 9-10, what was the cost of calls made on mobile telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

Mr. Howard: Mobile telephone call charges in my Department, including executive agencies, are estimated to be about £90,000. All or nearly all mobile telephones are bought, at costs which vary from year to year and cannot be quantified except at disproportionate cost. Maintenance costs are small, as it is not deemed necessary to let maintenance contracts.

Correspondence

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the letter on Direct Mail from the hon. Member for Neath on 10 November and the Minister of State's reply of 13 December.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I am placing a copy of the correspondence in the Library of the House.

Police Authority Funding

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each police authority (a) the standard spending assessment and (b) the actual spending broken down into (i) local authority actual spend and (ii) Home Office grant; (c) the authorised establishment levels and (d) the actual establishment levels for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information provided in the tables is for 1992-93, which is the most recent year for which expenditure outturn is available:

Belmarsh Prison

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions prisoners or charged persons have been transported between Belmarsh courts and Belmarsh prison by vehicles since the connecting security tunnel was opened; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. John Austin-Walker, dated 23 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of occasions prisoners or charged persons have been transported between Belmarsh Courts and Belmarsh Prison by vehicles since the connecting security tunnel was opened.

Woolwich Crown Court is housed in the building adjacent to Belmarsh prison and the two are connected by the secure tunnel. Motor transport was used on twenty-two occasions to transport prisoners between the two buildings. Twenty of these journeys were as a result of the closure of Greenwich Magistrates Court for renovation. While hearings before magistrates were being held in available court space at Woolwich Crown Court it was decided to continue with the established routine for court escorts. A change in practice would have necessitated the movement of remand prisoners through the tunnel at the same time as category A and trial prisoners. The combination of these movements would have been difficult to control, and presented potential risks.

The other two journeys were police escorts and not under the control of the Prison Service.

The tunnel is now used for all escorts whenever Woolwich Crown Court is sitting.

Secure Training Units

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has put on the cost of (a) building and (b) running annually the first five secure training units for persistent juvenile offenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The annual cost of secure training centres is estimated to be in excess of £30 million a year. This estimate includes running, building and financing costs, because contractors will be providing the capital to build the centres. The cost of post-release supervision is also included, as are Home Office administrative costs. The actual costs will depend on the results of the competitive tendering exercise.

EU Residence Rights

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in what United Kingdom legislation provision is made for retired self-employed citizens of the European Union entitled to the benefits set out in Council directive 75/34 EC relating to residence rights;

(2) in what United Kingdom legislation provision is made to give effect to article 5 of Council directive 75/34 relating to the period within which a retired self-employed citizen of the European Union may exercise the right of residence.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The draft (European Economic Area) Order 1994, which was approved by the House on 9 May 1994, makes full provision to transpose the EC rights of residence directives, including directive 75/34/EEC, into the United Kingdom law. Hitherto, the directives have been implemented either by way of the immigration rules (HC 251) or administratively.

Disabled Prisoners

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what provisions are made in prisons for disabled prisoners;

(2) if he will list those prisons where (a) provisions are made for disabled prisoners and (b) no provision is made; and what plans he has for improvements in facilities for prisoners with disabilities;

(3) if he will publish the findings and recommendation of his most recent survey of (a) disabled facilities for prisoners and (b) for visitors to prisons who have disabilities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 23 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about facilities in prisons for disabled prisoners.

The practice of the Prison Service is for staff to ensure that the needs of prisoners with disabilities are met on an individual basis, from reception throughout their time in custody. Staff assess their requirements and seek to provide particular facilities depending on the nature of the disability. The construction of facilities for disabled prisoners, staff and visitors is part of this process and local minor work—such as cell modification—will cover most individual needs. For this reason, it is not possible to categorise prisons into those that do and do not have provision for disabled persons.

The Prison Design Briefing System guidelines provide for access ramps, lifts, toilets, and for circulation routes to be made suitable for the passage of wheelchairs. These standards are taken into account in the building of new and the refurbishment of old prisons when this is possible.

Surveys of facilities for the disabled provided as part of the capital building programme were undertaken in 1989 and 1993, but neither were able to cover the vast majority of building work undertaken locally, nor of the other facilities that had been supplied for disabled prisoners. There would be no merit in publishing such incomplete documents.

Governors identify in their Strategic Development Plans what building work and facilities may be required in the forthcoming year for prisoners, staff and visitors. Most schemes will not require large sums of money and can be met using local funds.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations from organisations representing the interests of prisoners with disabilities he has received; and if he will list the organisations concerned.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 23 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about representations from organisations representing the interests of prisoners with disabilities.

Representations have recently been received from "Disabilty Matters Limited" and "Mikewatch", an organisation set up to act on behalf of an individual disabled prisoner.

The organisations have expressed concern over the opportunities that prisoners with disabilities have to participate in the education, work and recreational activities which are available to other prisoners.

The supply of equipment to meet the special needs of prisoners and the opportunity to transfer to other establishments has also been raised.

These representations are being considered and a reply will be sent to the organisations concerned as soon as possible.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have disabilities (a) in total and (b) in each standard age group.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 23 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the numbers of prisoners who have disabilities, both in total and by age group.

This information is not collected centrally and I regret that it could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Market Testing

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost of all market-testing exercises (a) within his Department excluding the Prison Service and (b) within the Prison Service.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The most recent published figures on the costs of market testing, covering the period April 1992 to December 1993, are contained in table 3 of the "Competing for Quality" section of the citizens charter second report 1994 (Cm. 2540).

Column 3 of that table shows, as an annual figure spread over 10 years, consultancy and other set-up costs for the Home Office of £24,000. It is not possible to identify separately the Prison Service element of this figure. Column 4 of the same table shows, on an annualised basis, central market-testing support costs for the Home Office as £3,383,000. This figure includes costs of £1,626,000 for the Prison Service. These terms are defined in the notes to table 3 on page 102 of the report.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the full cost of the market test of information and library services at his Department including (a) the cost incurred by the market-testing division, (b) the cost of consultants used by the market-testing division, (c) the cost of the in-house bid, (d) the cost of consultants used by the in-house team and (e) the cost of advice for other internal departments.

Mr. Charles Wardle: A study was undertaken last year of the scope for market-testing the Home Office's information and library services. This study identified a lack of market readiness to provide these services and it was therefore decided not to proceed with the market test. The study also identified efficiency improvements to the existing service. The staff costs for the scoping study are estimated to be about £12,000, substantially lower than the value of the efficiency improvements. No other significant costs were incurred: no consultants were employed and no bids were invited.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of the market test of the research and planning unit; and how many staff hours it is estimated will be involved.

Mr. Charless Wardle: The internal research function of the Home Office's research and planning unit has been included in the Home Office's provisional market-testing programme for the programme year October 1994 to September 1995. If its inclusion in the programme is confirmed, an initial study will consider the scope for testing this activity against the market. In advance of that study, it is not possible to estimate the staff and other costs of any market test.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time of detention in police stations of asylum seekers who are currently being held in detention in police stations; and what are the nationalities of those being held.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Airways (Claims)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the letter to the hon. Member for Bradford, West, dated 26 April, which he placed in the Library, whether British Caledonian has paid the claim submitted by his Department on 20 February in respect of the costs of detaining and escorting passengers who were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom after arriving on 15 December on BA 1262 (KT 310); whether Leisure International Airways has now paid claims submitted by his Department on 7 March in respect of detention and escorting passengers and submitted on 18 April in respect of detention and escorting passengers who were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom after arriving on 21 December on flight ULE 966; what action is being taken to recover these moneys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In April, Caledonian Airways Ltd. settled its invoices in full. Payment is still awaited from Leisure International Airways.

Prisoners (Home Leave)

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will issue his consultative document on the subject of home leave for prisoners; and what will be the timetable for the submission of responses.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The final report by the working group reviewing the operation of the home leave and temporary release schemes has not yet been submitted to the Home Secretary. Initial recommendations by the working group have been considered by the Prisons Board and the Home Secretary.

The working group includes representatives of the organisations principally affected, including the Prison Service, probation service, police and victim support. There are currently no plans to issue the final report for further consultation.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid and Trade Provision

43. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which are the three firms in the United Kingdom which have benefited most from the aid and trade provisions in the past five years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The three companies are Balfour Beatty, Foster Wheeler and Snamprogetti (UK) Ltd.

Know-how Funds

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new proposals he has to improve the application of know-how funds in the Baltic states.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The know-how fund in the Baltic states will continue to provide rapid and flexible help for the reform process.

Humanitarian Aid

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had to improve the delivery of humanitarian aid through the United Nations.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have a continuing dialogue with the United Nations on humanitarian relief issues. Most recently, the United Nations Under-Secretary General for Humanitarian Affairs called on the Minister for Overseas Development on 12 May. My noble Friend intends to discuss these matters further in New York this week.

Developing Countries

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the criteria used for deciding on the level of aid to developing countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We give aid where it will be most effective in promoting sustainable economic and social development, focused on the poorest countries.

Population and Reproductive Health

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many votes the European Union will have at the international conference on population and development in Cairo in September; and whether he expects each European Union member state to cast its vote separately on decisions about the policy declaration of the conference.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Each member of the United Nations has one vote. However, we expect the content of the conference document to be decided by consensus.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who will be in the British delegation to the international conference on population and development to be held in Cairo in September.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British delegation to the international conference on population and development will be led by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development and will include staff of the Overseas Development Administration, the diplomatic wing of Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of Health, the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and the British Council. The chairman of the all-party parliamentary group on population and development and three representatives from non-governmental organisations are also expected to join the delegation.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which are the next priority countries for the Overseas Development Administration in terms of increased assistance for reproductive health.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The priority countries in which ODA will be concentrating bilateral assistance for reproductive health will be announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development at a population meeting to be held at the Royal Society on July 11.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the development policy of the European Union in respect of population and reproductive health matters.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The European Union maintained unanimity on population and reproductive health policy matters during negotiations in April on the draft plan of action for the international conference on population and development, which takes place in Cairo in September. Under the Horizon 2000 initiative aimed at enhancing co-ordination between the Commission and member states' development assistance in the run-up to the year 2000, the family planning resolution agreed by the Council and member states meeting in Council in November 1992 will be reviewed in 1995. As part of the same process the Development Council approved guidelines on health and HIV/AIDS at its meeting on 6 May 1994.

Multinational Aid

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of multilateral overseas development assistance has been directed through (a) the European Community or European Union and (b) each of the United Nations multilateral agencies in each year since 1987.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The breakdown is as follows:

United Kingdom multilateral net official development assistance
Percentage through EC and United Nations agencies

Recipient	1987 (per cent.)	1988 (per cent.)	1989 (per cent.)	1990 (per cent.)	1991 (per cent.)	1992 (per cent.)

[2] Prior to 1992, payments in respect of special appeals were included in the totals of the United Nations organisation concerned, e.g. UNHCR. In 1992, United Nations special appeals payments were grouped together and reported to DAC as "UN Special Appeals".

Civil Servants

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many civil servants there are in the Overseas Development Administration currently; and how many there were (a) in 1984 and (b) in 1974; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The requested information is:

	1974	1984	1994
Total staff numbers as at 1 April	2,164	1,756	1,554

Reductions have been made possible through rationalisation and efficiency improvements.

SCOTLAND

Lothian Health

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received Lothian Health's acute services strategy; and when he will announce his decision on it.

Mr. Stewart: Lothian Health's final acute services strategy was submitted to Ministers on 28 April 1994. The proposals are currently being considered in detail, and Ministers expect to be in a position to make a public announcement on the proposals in the summer.

Royal Scottish National Hospital

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce his decision on the proposed merger of the Royal Scottish national hospital and community NHS trust and the Forth Valley health care unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The public consultation on the proposed merger of the Royal Scottish national hospital and community NHS trust and the Forth Valley health care unit to form the Central Scotland Healthcare NHS trust was carried out by Forth Valley health board and a report was submitted to me in April. The report indicated broad support for the proposals.

As with all trust applications, the merger proposal has been considered against the published criteria of benefits for patients, management competence, the involvement of clinicians and other health care professionals in management and financial viability.

The proposed trust arrangements meet these criteria and consequently I have decided to give my approval to the merger proposal. The new trust will come into operation on 1 October 1994.

Furthermore, I am pleased to announce that Mr. Adrian Ward MBE, chairman of the Royal Scottish national hospital and community NHS trust, has accepted my invitation to serve as chairman of the new trust. The names of the other non-executive directors will be announced later.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the allocated budget, and the actual expenditure, for the environmentally sensitive area schemes in (a) the Machair of the Uists, (b) Breadalbane and (c) Loch Lomond in each financial year since 1989.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 19 May 1994]: The expenditure information required is set out in the table.

	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	1991-92 £	1992-93 £	[1]1993-94 £
Machair of the Uists	124,754	159,897	189,925	222,420	215,127
Breadalbane	202,437	233,698	270,699	219,707	154,109
Loch Lomond	43,180	71,706	100,437	77,805	76,751

Individual ESAs are not given an allocated budget. Expenditure is contained within the overall ESA scheme provision.

Forestry

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration has been given to imposing a requirement for environmental impact assessment when planning permission for forestry plantation is considered; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 18 May 1994]: Under the Environmental Assessment (Afforestation) Regulations—SI No. 1207—introduced in 1988, environmental assessment is required where an afforestation project is likely to have significant effects on the environment and may lead to adverse ecological changes.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has given to NHS trusts on (a) the kinds of information which they may deny to hon. Members and (b) the activities of a hospital trust that may be considered commercially confidential.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 20 May 1994]: There has been no advice to NHS trusts to deny any information to hon. Members but trusts are required to respect the right to patient confidentiality. Circular MEL(1993)38 issued on 25 March 1993 sets out the ground rules for access to information and openness in contracting. Trusts have been encouraged to adopt an open approach. A copy of the circular has been placed in the Library of the House.

Barkers Scotland Ltd.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of the market research being carried out by Barkers Scotland Ltd. on behalf of the Scottish Office; and what was its purpose.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 20 May 1994]: To ensure that it was written in a style which would be readily understood by all householders, Market Research Scotland Ltd. carried out pre-publication market testing of the leaflet, published last week, setting out council water charges and the cost of sewerage in each regional and islands council area. The work was commissioned for the Scottish Office through Barkers Scotland Ltd. at a cost of £1,000.

Prison Deaths

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the self-inflicted deaths that have occurred in Scottish prison establishments over the past 10 years, giving details of the name, age, status, offence and inquest verdict of each of the deceased and the name of the prisons in which the deaths occurred.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1994 c. 620]: The chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service, Mr. E. W. Frizzell, has written further to the hon. Member.

Letter from E. W. Frizzell to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 23 May 1994:

I wrote to you on 5 May in response to your Question about self-inflicted deaths in Scottish penal establishments and undertook to forward details of the prisoners' offence or alleged offence. These are now included in the table below which, for ease of reference, also repeats the information given in my earlier letter and takes the opportunity to correct one minor mistake which appeared there, for which I apologise.

HEALTH

Deprived Areas

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which are the top 10 deprived areas in England; and which are the top 10 areas with (a) the highest birth rates and (b) the greatest numbers of new cases of TB every year.

Mr. Sackville: The 10 highest scoring district health authorities in England using the Department of the Environment's index of local conditions, applied to district health authority boundaries as they were on 1 April 1992, were:

Highest scoring DHAs using DoE Index of Local Conditions

Newham (highest)
Lewisham and North Southwark
City and Hackney
Tower Hamlets
Camberwell
Bloomsbury and Islington
West Lambeth
Parkside
Waltham Forest
Haringey

Note: This table uses 1991 census data.

The ten DHAs with the highest birth rates[1] in 1991 were:

District health authorities

East Birmingham
Newham
North Manchester
West Birmingham
Tower Hamlets
Bradford
Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale
Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley
City and Hackney
Rochdale

[1] This ranking has been constructed using the total period fertility rate (TPFR) which is derived by summing the fertility rates for a given year (live births per woman) by five-year age-groups up to the age of which the childbearing lifespan of women is effectively finished, taken to be age 50. Hence it is a summary measure of the overall level of the year's age-specific fertility rates. The TPFR indicates the average number of children which would be born per woman if a group of women were to experience the age-specific fertility rates of the calendar year in question throughout their childbearing lives.

The 10 family health services authorities with the highest recorded number of new cases of tuberculosis in 1991—this information is not available by district health authority—were:

Birmingham
Brent and Harrow
Bradford
Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham
Leicestershire
Ealing, Hammersmith and Hounslow
Lancashire
City and East London
Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster
Enfield and Haringey[1]
Redbridge and Waltham Forest[1]

Nurses

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received about the career prospects of nurses from ethnic minorities; and if she will commission a survey.

Mr. Sackville: None. The Department has commissioned the Policy Studies Institute to undertake a study on the careers of nursing staff in a multiracial society. It is expected that the findings will be published in late 1994.

Mental Health

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of working days lost through problems of mental health in 1993-94; and what is the estimated total cost of that absence from work.

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 4 November 1993 at cols. 453-54.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the level of per capita spending on mental health care provided by hospital and community trusts for residents of (a) London, (b) Cornwall, (c) Hertford, (d) Leeds, (e) Newcastle, (f) Liverpool and (g) East Sussex.

Mr. Bowis: Information on expenditure by national health service trusts on a per capita basis cannot be provided as trusts do not provide services for fixed populations.

Colorectal Cancer

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reasons underlay the decision not to refer to deaths caused by colorectal cancer in her paper the "The Health of the Nation"; and how many deaths occurred in each of the last five years from this form of cancer.

Mr. Sackville: The Government's objective is a reduction in mortality and morbidity caused by all cancers. Although colorectal cancer is a major cause of premature death or avoidable ill health, it has not—unlike breast, cervical, skin and lung cancer—been possible to identify a procedure which is both effective and measurable. The value of effective screening for colorectal cancer is therefore still uncertain, although the potential of such a programme remains under review.

Deaths occurring in England and Wales from malignant neoplasma of the colon and rectum are shown in the table:

	Colon	Rectum, Rectosigmoid Junction and Anus
1988	11,494	5,756
1989	11,626	5,756
1990	11,527	5,696
1991	11,386	5,685
1992	11,781	5,622

Dentists

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists have given written notice to have their names removed from dental lists since December 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total number of dentists who have given written notice to have their names removed from dental lists between 27 November 1992 and 13 May 1994 is 212. Four hundred and ten dentists were added to the lists in the period 31 December 1992 to 31 December 1993.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have contacted each family health services authority asking for help in finding a dentist in the period since December 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information will be placed in the Library.

Elderly People (Treatment)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether she will conduct a review of health authorities' purchasing policies to identify the extent to which elderly people are being excluded from certain treatment on grounds of their age;

(2) what action she intends to take to establish whether health authorities are issuing contracts which exclude people from treatment on grounds of their age.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is no need to conduct such a review. The National Health Service Executive, through its monitoring of district health authorities' purchasing plans and its corporate contracts with regional health authorities, already reviews and monitors annually the purchasing intentions of DHAs and general practitioner fundholders.

Recorded Diseases, London

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of (a) rickets, (b) scurvy, (c) tuberculosis, (d) diphtheria and (e) dysentery were recorded in inner London for 1979, 1985 and each year since.

Mr. Sackville: Notifications of tuberculosis, diphtheria and dysentery are shown in the table.

There is no reliable source of data on rickets and scurvy.

Notifications of selected infectious diseases in Inner London 1979, 1985-1992

Inner London	1979	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
All tuberculosis	1,203	887	810	717	751	831	879	922	1,024
Diphtheria	0	1	0	1	0	2	1	1	1
Dysentery	195	388	234	257	241	258	229	225	335

Cancer Treatment Costs

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of medical oncology, with radiotherapy costs identified separately, per out-patient day case and in-patient episode for patients attending (a) St. Bartholomew's, (b) University College London, (c) Guy's, (d) the Royal Marsden, (e) Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Welwyn, (f) Royal Sussex, (g) Addenbrookes and (h) John Radcliffe.

Mr. Sackville: The available information is shown in the table. It is not possible to separate out radiotherapy costs from medical oncology.

Costing information for Medical Oncology in 1992-93

	Cost per Finished Consultant Episode for patients using a bed £	Cost per out-patient attendance £
Barts Group of Hospitals Directly Managed Unit (including St. Bartholomews)	1,025·55	154·86
Bloomsbury and Islington Acute Directly Managed Unit (including University College Hospital)	1,221·11	n/a
Guys and Lewisham NHS Trust (including Guys)	1,640·01	123·10
Royal Marsden Special Health Authority	2,005·39	144·86

	Cost per Finished Consultant Episode for patients using a bed £	Cost per out-patient attendance £
East Herts NHS Trust (including Queen Elizabeth Hospital)	see note 3
Brighton Healthcare Directly Managed Unit (including Royal Sussex Hospital)	n/a	n/a
Addenbrooke's Hospital Directly Managed Unit (including Addenbrooke's Hospital)	n/a	n/a
John Radcliffe Hospital Directly Managed Unit (including John Radcliffe Hospital)	n/a	n/a Source: Annual financial returns of health authorities and NHS trusts.

Notes:

1. All figures are provisional.

2. n/a = the hospital does not record any expenditure associated with this particular specialty.

3. East Herts NHS trust (including Queen Elizabeth hospital) does not have a comparable medical oncology service with the other named hospitals.

Primary Care (Spending)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the per capita spending on primary care for residents of (a) London, (b) Cambridge, (c) Hertford, (d) Brighton, (e) Stevenage, (f) Gloucester, (g) Cheltenham, (h) Durham and (i) Truro.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information is not collected in the form requested.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average length of time on the waiting list for (a) hysterectomy, (b) heart by-pass and (c) hip replacement, for patients living in (i) Bloomsbury and Islington, (ii) Redbridge and Waltham Forest, (iii) south-east London, (iv) Hertford, (v) Cambridge, (vi) Manchester, (vii) north Cornwall, (viii) Brighton, (ix) Eastbourne and (x) Leeds.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on waiting times is collected by specialty, district health authority and national health service trust. This information is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", copies of which are available in the Library. Since 1988 the overall average waiting time has fallen from over nine months to less than five.

Purchasing Authorities

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether she will intervene in the decisions of purchasing authorities to ensure that all residents of those areas are guaranteed the elective or emergency treatment that they need.

Mr. Sackville: It is the responsibility of health authorities to assess the health care needs of their local population.

Bed Availability

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many acute beds were available per head of the population for residents of (a) Newcastle, (b) Birmingham, (c) Manchester, (d) Leeds, (e) Liverpool and (f) London for 1985 and each year since 1989;

(2) how many NHS continuing care beds were available per head of the population for residents of (a) Newcastle, (b) Birmingham, (c) Manchester, (d) Leeds, (e) Liverpool and (f) London for 1985, 1987 and each year since 1989;

(3) how many registered nursing home beds were available per head of the population for residents of (a) Newcastle, (b) Birmingham, (c) Manchester, (d) Leeds, (e) Liverpool and (f) London for 1985, 1987 and each year since 1989.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available in the form requested.

Adoptions

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she intends to take to ensure that both adoptive parents and young people who have been the subjects of trans-racial adoptions are consulted as part of the consultations on her White Paper on the future of adoption.

Mr. Bowis: The White Paper "Adoption: The Future" is not a consultation document but contains the Government proposals for reforming adoption law. Publication of the White Paper followed four years work of reviewing adoption law by an inter-departmental working group during which time several consultative documents were issued.

Views on the Government's plans from parents who have adopted children from ethnic minority cultures, as well as the young people themselves, have been made known to the Department through responses received from local authority social services, voluntary adoption agencies and adoption support groups as well as individual correspondents.

In formulating the adoption proposals, the Government have taken account of the responses to the various consultation documents as well as the latest research, thinking and practice on a variety of adoption issues.

GP Fundholders, London

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner fundholders are practising in inner London; and what proportion they represent of all general practitioners in London.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are 278 general practitioner fundholders practising in inner London representing 17 per cent. of all general practitioners in that area.

Inequalities and Health

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what input other Government Departments will have into the new working party on inequalities and health; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The recently established sub-group of the Chief Medical Officer's "Health of the Nation" working group will be looking at variations in health. The sub-group's terms of reference focus on the provision of practical advice to the Department of Health and the national health service but other Government Departments are being kept informed of its work.

Nurse Prescribing

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will approve the introduction of nurse prescribing to general practitioners' practices which are not fundholders.

Dr. Mawhinney: The extension of nurse prescribing to non-fundholding practices will be considered in the light of experience gained from the eight demonstration projects which are to be introduced in October.

Research Allocation

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will publish the report on the calculation of the special increment for teaching and research which was commissioned in 1993 by her Department to inform resource allocation.

Dr. Mawhinney: In due course.

London Hospitals

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which London hospitals were fined by their purchasers for failing to meet contract specifications for elective treatments in each year since 1991; and what was the amount of the fine in each case.

Dr. Mawhinney: Contracts that purchasers have with hospitals may contain clauses which enable financial penalties to be imposed in the event of contract specifications not being met. These contracts are agreed locally and any resulting penalties are not monitored by the national health service executive.

The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairmen of the relevant health authorities for details.

Mouth Cancer

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment her Department has made of links between smoking tobacco and the incidence of mouth cancer.

Mr. Sackville: Available research shows that an increased risk of cancer of the mouth, relative to that in non-smokers, has been found among tobacco smokers. The risk is of similar magnitude for cigarette, cigar and pipe smokers.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the notified cases of mouth cancer were discovered during routine dental check-ups in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The origin of the diagnosis of oral cancer is not routinely recorded.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what materials her Department has produced or funded to educate people on the dangers of mouth cancer.

Mr. Sackville: Smoking and excessive alcohol consumption, the main known risks factors for mouth cancer, are addressed through a variety of material produced by the Health Education Authority and others.

Health Workers (Redundancies)

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 318, what are the total numbers of redundancies in inner London hospitals since April 1993 by each hospital; and if she will categorise redundancies under the headings (a) ancillary, (b) nursing, (c) doctors, (d) consultants and (e) managers.

Dr. Mawhinney: The previous reply covered only those hospitals in receipt of transitional funding. Information on redundancies across all inner London hospitals is not available centrally.

Operational Mergers

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operational mergers currently exist between district health authorities and family health services authorities in England; and if she will list those authorities operating on such a basis.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Performance Tables

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 20 April, Official Report, column 545, what were the initial non-recurring set up costs for the NHS performance tables.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 20 April, Official Report, column 545.

Continuing Care

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 323, if it is her policy that in all cases payment rests on public funds when a patient is discharged from hospital because of a lack of long-stay beds and is still in need of continuing care in a nursing home.

Mr. Bowis: Arrangements for continuing care will depend on the assessed needs of the individual.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 317-18, if she will list the trusts and the amounts involved where approval has been given for trusts to invest in (a) United Kingdom public sector institutions, (b) banks and (c) building societies.

Mr. Sackville: The approval referred to previously is a general approval as to the institutions in which trusts may invest surplus cash. Individual trusts do not require specific approval for their investment arrangements unless they wish to invest surplus cash other than in an approved institution. No trust has applied to use a non-approved institution. Trusts are not required to notify my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or the national health service executive the details of their investing activities, as the amounts involved will vary in the normal course of business and are in any event subject to independent audit.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 17 May Official Report, column 417, which trusts have been investigated by the NHS executive for (a) merger and (b) dissolution.

Mr. Sackville: The circumstances of each trust that materially failed to meet a financial duty in 1993-94 have been reviewed by the national health service executive to ensure that they take appropriate action in the current year. In the case of two trusts, the Royal Liverpool University hospital NHS trust and Broadgreen Hospital NHS trust, their plans include a proposal to dissolve themselves and form a new trust to run the facilities that are managed separately by them at present. As a result, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has given permission to North West regional health authority to consult on this proposal. Consultation, which lasts for three months, commenced on 16 May 1994.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library copies of reports received from practice counsellors in general pratitioner fundholding practices, indicating how they intend to achieve the "The Health of the Nation" targets.

Dr. Mawhinney: Such information is not available centrally.

WALES

Care and Repair Cymru

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce the funding allocations to care and repair schemes in Wales, and Care and Repair Cymru for 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: An offer of grant for the first quarter of 1994-95 has been made both to individual schemes and to Care and Repair Cymru. Decisions on the remainder of the year will follow shortly.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department's review of care and repair in Wales is expected to be completed; when the review is completed; and what plans he has to publish the results and arrange for consultation on the review's proposals.

Mr. Redwood: I expect the review of central funding to care and repair schemes to be completed shortly. My officials will then discuss the future funding of the care and repair movement with Care and Repair Cymru.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the Welsh Office received an answer from the Welsh Development Agency following its letter to the agency on 25 November 1991 concerning the case of Mr. Price.

Mr. Redwood: On 27 November 1991.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 12 May, Official Report, column 205, whether the Welsh Office made any communication with the Welsh Development Agency between 25 November 1991 and 19 February 1992 concerning the redundancy of Mr. Price.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much the Welsh Office has made available in supplementary credit approvals for energy efficiency in local authority administrative buildings in Wales to encourage a 15 per cent. reduction in energy consumption in each year the scheme has been available.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer Friday 20 May 1994]: No supplementary credit approvals have been made specifically for energy efficiency for local authority administrative buildings in Wales. In 1993-94, 79 projects took place in Wales under the "other environmental services" budget.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Integrated Benefit Information System

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will publish a report on the progress of the integrated benefit information system; when the transition to the new integrated benefit information system will take place; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the estimated cost of introducing the integrated benefit information system computer system into all agencies.

Mr. Burt: In September 1993, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State announced the introduction of a one-stop service to Benefits Agency offices and that as part of that service, a new computer system, the integrated benefit information system—IBIS—would be available by July 1994.

The IBIS is now available to all Benefits Agency offices. Offices are starting to use it alongside existing systems and other initiatives to support their transition to the business goals of one stop. There are, however, no plans to publish a report on its progress.

Each agency has a different business focus so it would not be appropriate to introduce the same computer system to them all. The IBIS was designed specifically for the Benefits Agency; however, other agencies are considering using the IBIS concept to deliver systems that will generate greater efficiencies in their own business. Detailed proposals and costings are not currently available.

Income Support

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures available for people claiming income support (a) by gender, (b) by region, (c) by marital status, (d) with dependants and (e) in total.

Mr. Burt: The available information is in the table.

Income support recipients

Type of recipient	Number (thousands)
Gender
Male	2,770
Female	3,001
Region
North Eastern	839
London North	1,018
South Western	411
Wales	312
Midlands	912
North Western	812
Scotland	553
London South	915
Living with a Partner
Single	4,759
With partner	1,012
Dependants
With dependants	1,658
No dependants	4,113
Total claimants	5,771

Notes:

1. Source: Income Support Statistics Quarterly Enquiry, August 1993.
2. Figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand and may not sum to the total given.
3. Regions are the Social Security Administrative Regions used by the Department prior to 1988.
4. Marital status information from Quarterly Enquiries is limited to whether the recipient is single or living with a partner.
5. Dependants are defined as young people under the age of 19 still living in the parental home.

Widowed Fathers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will review the working of existing legislation to ensure that widowed fathers and their children are treated equally in social security law with widowed mothers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: We have no plans to extend the current widowed mother's benefit provisions to widowed fathers.

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested.

Independent Living Fund

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans there are to introduce a standard method by which local authorities can determine equitable hourly rates for care costs for independent living 1993 fund claimants, and if he will make a statement;

(2) what training is received by staff working in local authority social services departments for assessing the eligibility of independent living 1993 fund claimants to personal assistance packages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: It is for local authorities to develop adequate training for their staff, and accurate methods for costing services. I understand that the director of the independent living 1993 fund continues to discuss with the Association of Directors of Social Services and others further ways in which they can be helped to do so.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications to the independent living 1993 fund have been turned down as a result of the failure of a local authority to provide the required £200 worth of services a week.

Mr. Scott: I am informed by the director of the Independent Living (1993) Fund that, in the first full year of operation, 105 applications were rejected for this reason.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of calls made on (a) car telephones and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested. The available information is in the table. Maintenance fees are not charged for this equipment.

1993-94 Costs	Mobile Telephones[1] (including Car Telephones) £
Benefits Agency
Annual running costs (including pagers)[2]	625,738·94
Equipment	[3]—
Contributions Agency
Annual running costs (including pagers)[2]	194,183·18
Equipment	36,574·50
Child Support Agency
Annual running costs (including pagers)[2]	41,532·00
Equipment	82,553·30
Information Technology Services Agency
Calls	60,868·54
Equipment	21,307·78
Quarterly line rental	161,122·50
DSS HQ (including Resettlement Agency)
Calls	5,807·94
Equipment	4,628·80
Quarterly line rental	15,187·50
War Pensions Agency
Annual running costs (including pagers)[2]	12,887
Equipment	12,875

Notes:

[1] The costs of car telephones and mobile telephones could be disaggregated only at disproportionate cost.

[2] The running costs of mobile telephones are included with those of pagers by some of the Agencies and could be disaggregated only at disproportionate cost.

[3] This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Benefits Payment Card

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consideration he has given to how long the owner of a benefits payment card which was incorrectly rejected by a machine reader would have to do without payment of benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: This issue will be addressed as part of the detailed design of the proposed payment system. Appropriate back-up procedures will be incorporated into any system, to be activated in the event of mechanical or electronic failure.

National Council for One Parent Families

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what grants have been made by his Department or its agencies to the National Council for One Parent Families in each year of the last five years.

Mr. Burt: Between 1991 and 31 March 1994 this Department provided £1 million to enable the National Council for One Parent Families to pilot return-to-work courses for lone parents and a consultancy action programme aimed at employers and other key organisations, which was designed to open up work opportunities for lone parents. In 1992 the child support unit—the forerunner to the Child Support Agency—paid about £4,000 to NaCOPF for expenses connected with a joint CSA/NaCOPF guide for lone parents who wished to return to work.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. Goodlad: The expenditure on management and financial consultants in 1992-93 is:

Diplomatic Wing	268,759
Aid Wing	451,907

Note: this excludes management and financial consultancies awarded under the aid programme.

Iraq

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to investigate cases cited by Amnesty International where refugees from Iraq after the 1991 Gulf war were mistreated by the Saudi Arabian authorities.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Nations Commissioner for Refugees has a permanent office in the refugee camp at Rafha and is studying the report. During her visit to Saudi Arabia in January 1993, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Mrs. Ogata, expressed her appreciation to the Saudi authorities for the high living standards that they have provided for the refugees.

Portable Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 6 May, Official Report, column 676, what was the cost of calls made on (a) car and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

Mr. Goodlad: A full breakdown of the costs incurred by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office during 1993-94 in respect of car and portable telephones is as follows:

FCO (Diplomatic and Aid Wings)	Financial year 1993-94 £
(a) Car
—calls	1,500
—cost of service (air time)	2,076
(b) Portable telephones
—calls	12,135
—cost of service (air time)	46,500
(c) Cost of new equipment (not hired)	6,077
(d) Maintenance costs	12,127
Total	80,415

Liberia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received, either directly or via the European Union or the United Nations, as to the selling of arms by peacekeeping forces in Liberia to the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy faction; and what representations he has made to the United Nations about the effect on the peacekeeping process.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received no such reports.

Rwanda

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of the mandate of the enhanced peacekeeping force in Rwanda; and when it is intended that the force will be in place.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Security Council resolution on Rwanda passed on 16 May—SCR 918—expands the mandate of the United Nations Aid Mission in Rwanda, as set out in SCR 912, to include the following tasks:

- (a) To contribute to the security and protection of displaced civilians at risk in Rwanda, including through the establishment and maintenance, where feasible, of secure humanitarian areas;
- (b) To provide security and support for the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian relief operations.

SCR 918 requests the Secretary-General to proceed immediately with the deployment of military observers currently stationed in Nairobi, and the strengthening of the United Nations mechanised battalion in Kigali to 800 personnel. The Secretary-General will report again soon to the Security Council on the next stage of deployment.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries have pledged troops and in what numbers for the United Nations peacekeeping force in Rwanda.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Consultations continue between the United Nations and potential new troop contributors. No details have yet been confirmed.

The Secretary-General is due to report to the Security Council in the near future about, interalia, the resources available for the operation.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what actions are being taken to co-ordinate military and humanitarian activity following the United Nation's decision to increase its military presence in Rwanda.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The special representative of the United Nations Secretary-General, working together with the Department of Peacekeeping Operations and the Department for Humanitarian Affairs in the United Nations secretariat, is responsible for ensuring effective co-ordination between United Nations military and humanitarian activity on the ground.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy in respect of each side in the conflict in Rwanda in the context of ending the bloodshed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The main priority is for an end to the fighting and we continue to urge all parties to implement a ceasefire and end the bloodshed. We fully support the efforts of the United Nations and the Organisation for African Unity and regional leaders to bring the fighting to an end.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what forward planning he and the international community are making to prevent the spread of the Rwandan conflict into Burundi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The international community is concerned that the Rwandan conflict should not spread into Burundi. A good offices and fact-finding mission has been deployed by the United Nations Security Council and OAU observers are also in place. Their aim is to assist the Government of Burundi to restore democratic institutions, rebuild confidence and stabilise the internal situation.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Rwanda about genocide.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No representations have been made to the Government of Rwanda about genocide. A special session of the United Nations Commission for Human Rights will shortly take place at which atrocities committed in Rwanda will be considered.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he will take to ensure that no British arms will be sold to the Rwandan Government.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 16 May, the United Nations Security Council adopted resolution 918 which imposes a mandatory arms embargo on Rwanda. In the United Kingdom this will be administered by the export control organisation of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the French Government about the supply of arms to the Rwandan Government.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No representations have been made to the French Government about the supply of arms to the Rwandan Government. On 16 May, the United Nations Security Council adopted resolution 918 which imposes a mandatory arms embargo on Rwanda. All countries, including France, will be bound to comply with the terms of the embargo.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his analysis of the causes of the conflict in Rwanda and of which party is the main cause of deaths in that country.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Tutsi domination of Rwanda's political and economic life ended in 1959. Since then Rwanda has repeatedly been the scene of mass killings and the flight of large numbers of Tutsis and some Hutus to neighbouring countries. There have also been repeated attempts by Tutsis to come back to power, each attempt giving rise to renewed ethnic violence and hatred. Reports indicate that the worst atrocities in the current conflict appear to be occurring in areas then controlled by the interim Government of Rwanda.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made as to whether the Government of Rwanda is contravening the United Nations convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide; and what action he is proposing to take to activate article IV of the convention to punish genocide.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In its declaration of 16 May, the Foreign Affairs Council appealed to all parties to the conflict to bring an end to the genocide. The United Nations Security Council, in its resolution 918, asked the Secretary-General to report as soon as possible on the investigations of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda.

Iran

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government will take to use their seat at the United Nations Security Council to secure (a) an international arms embargo against the Government of Iran and (b) a boycott of Iranian goods.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no current intention of seeking either measure. As a matter of declared national policy, the United Kingdom refuses to supply arms to Iran.

Palestine

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made about the adequacy of the mandate of the temporary international presence in Hebron; and what additional powers he will seek to safeguard the Palestinians.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The mandate for the temporary international presence for Hebron was agreed by Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organisation. The agreement signed on 4 May on Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho includes provision for further observers in these areas. We and our European Union partners have offered to participate if requested by the parties.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what diplomatic presence the Government have or intend to have in Gaza and Jericho.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: These areas are covered by Her Majesty's consul general in Jerusalem who visits them regularly. In addition, the British Council maintains an office in the Gaza strip.

Sudan

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government will take to use their seat at the United Nations Security Council to secure an international fuel and arms embargo against the Government of Sudan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The imposition of mandatory measures against Sudan would require a determination by the Security Council that a threat existed to international peace and security. Such a determination has not been made.

The United Kingdom already implements an arms embargo against Sudan, which was imposed by the European Union in March.

China

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the number and functions of labour camps in China; and what representations he has made to the Chinese Government about the use of such camps.

Mr. Goodlad: We have no precise assessment of the number of labour camps. But the use of forced labour is an area of human rights abuse highlighted in the report produced by my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Howe after his visit to China in December 1992. We have regularly urged the Chinese authorities to take up my noble Friend's recommendations in this respect.

EC Development

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the position of Her Majesty's Government with regard to a possible governmental working group on EC development including a delegation from the European Parliament.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The declaration issued at the informal meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council at Ioannina on 28 March provides for > "a Reflection Group of Representatives of the Foreign Ministers, which should be created by the European Council in Corfu and start its work mid 1995. This Group will work in association with the European Parliament".

We support that declaration, to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs agreed.

Italy

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will initiate proposals for Italy to be suspended from the Council of Europe.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom ambassador met members of the new Italian Government; and what was discussed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Her Majesty's ambassador in Rome has met representatives from all the political parties in the new Italian coalition Government to discuss with them both internal political developments and foreign affairs issues.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what views he conveyed over the inclusion of neo-fascists in the Italian cabinet when he met representatives of that Government.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met Signor Martino, his new Italian counterpart, in Brussels on 16 May. They had a wide-ranging discussion on foreign policy issues. They did not discuss individual appointments in the new Italian Government.

South Africa

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had regarding the timetable for admission of South Africa to the Commonwealth with (a) the Government of South Africa and (b) the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: At their conference in Cyprus last October, Heads of Commonwealth Governments agreed that > "While it was for the new, democratically elected government in South Africa to decide on whether it should seek to return to the Commonwealth, Heads of Government looked forward to welcoming a non-racial and democratic South Africa back into the Commonwealth at the earliest possible opportunity".

President Mandela has stated his wish that South Africa return to the Commonwealth. As soon as a formal request seeking re-admission is made by the South African Government, the Commonwealth Secretary-General will inform member Governments.

EDUCATION

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. Forth: In [illegible] financial year 1992-93, the Department spent £1·997 million on management and financial consultants.

Grant-maintained Schools Foundation

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what level of grant aid the Grant-maintained Schools Foundation Ltd. will receive in 1994-95; and who has been appointed as finance director and accounting officer for the foundation.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Grant-maintained Schools Foundation Ltd. is currently in discussion with the Department about grant aid for 1994-95. I will write to the hon. Member when the total level of grant and associated financial responsibilities have been finalised.

Muslim Girls Community High School

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he received an application seeking voluntary-aided status from the Bradford Muslim Girls community high school; whether he has received all the information he requires to enable him to reach a decision on the application; when he expects to announce his decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department received proposals seeking voluntary-aided status for the Bradford Muslim Girls community high school on 30 March. A two-month statutory objection period follows the publication of such proposals. Because of my right hon. Friend's role in these matters, it is not appropriate to comment on proposals which will come before him for decision. We shall make a decision as soon as is compatible with a full and careful consideration of the proposals.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

35. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Attorney-General what steps the Crown Prosecution Service is taking to improve charging practice.

The Attorney-General: The initial decision to charge is usually taken by the police. The Crown Prosecution Service and the police are together developing guidance to help officers to select the right charge at the outset.

37. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Attorney-General if he will pay an official visit to the Crown Prosecution Service in Croydon to discuss its effectiveness.

The Solicitor-General: I have no plans to visit the Crown Prosecution Service in Croydon at present.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Attorney-General what steps the Crown Prosecution Service is taking to introduce team working.

The Solicitor-General: Historically, lawyers worked primarily in the magistrates courts. Pilot schemes to bring lawyers, law clerks, and support staff together in teams to handle all types of case in both the magistrates courts and the Crown courts are being set up in one branch of each Crown Prosecution Service area.

38. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects to announce the results of the revision of the code of conduct for crown prosecutors.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions expects to publish the new code in the near future.

EMPLOYMENT

Workplace Deaths

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) of 30 March, Official Report, column 813, for what reason the information on the average length of time of investigation into workplace deaths is not available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The amount of time spent by inspectors investigating all accidents is recorded locally and principally used to monitor use of resources. It is not possible to isolate information on the use of resources solely used in the investigation of fatalities.

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information in the form requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Construction Industry, London

Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the estimated number of people employed in the construction industry within London for each year since 1988; and what is his estimate for the current year.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is given in the table:

Employees in the construction industry-Greater London

	000s
1988	139
1989	137
1990	132
1991	120
1992	109
1993	100

Figures as at June of each year.

Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what studies his Department has initiated into the effects of a release of local authority capital receipts within the London area on levels of employment within the construction industry; and if he will publish their findings.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department has not undertaken any such studies.

Disabled People (Fax Machines)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many fax machines are currently on loan to people with disability under the aids-to-employment scheme; what service arrangements exist for such equipment; and in what circumstances fax machines are (a) removed, (b) updated or (c) determined to be obsolete.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Joan Walley, dated 23 May 1994:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of fax machines currently on loan to people with disabilities under the Special Aids to Employment scheme, (SAE) together with servicing arrangements, the circumstances of removal, updating and determining obsolescence.

The numbers that you have asked for are not held centrally for machines issued before October 1993.

Forty two fax machines were issued to clients under the SAE in the six months to April 1994, together with six fax card adaptations which allow receipt and transmission of faxes on personal computers.

During the same period, one fax machine previously issued required repair.

As owner of the aid, the ES is responsible for repairs, maintenance and servicing contracts are not taken out by the ES because of the costs involved and the low incidence of breakdown. Where equipment breaks down, a replacement may be issued as a temporary back-up whilst repair is effected.

Fax machines would normally only be removed if the client left employment or no longer required the equipment. Updating takes place when the need for more advanced equipment is identified.

Fax hardware and software have both remained stable platforms in the past two years, advance being made largely in terms of speed of fax transmission, which does not affect the ability of older machines to either send or receive messages. For this reason, it is generally accepted that older machines may be slower in transmission but are not regarded as obsolete.

I hope this is helpful.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the future of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Britain's health and safety record is among the best in the world. I look to the Health and Safety Executive to continue to play its part in improving that record.

Unemployment, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in the Doncaster area between the ages of 18 and 25 years are currently unemployed.

Miss Widdecombe: In the Doncaster travel-to-work-area unadjusted claimant unemployment amongst 18-24 year olds—the closest available age group—stood at 3,981 in April 1994.

Barnsley-Doncaster Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met small business representatives to discuss the working of Barnsley-Doncaster TEC; when is his next meeting; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, regularly meets training and enterprise directors, many of whom represent small businesses. He also recently met the Federation of Small Businesses and the Forum of Private Business to discuss the work of TECs.

My right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade, has overall responsibility for the Government's relations with business and has regular contact with its representative organisations.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with the Secretaries of State for (a) Health and (b) Social Security in regard to the implementation of the incapacity benefit to those invalided out of employment by multiple sclerosis.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The implementation of incapacity benefit is a matter for my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Social Security. Discussions have taken place between our two Departments on several aspects of the new benefit, including its implementation and the development of the medical test. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has also been consulted.

I understand that the new more objective medical test of incapacity will take account of the variable and fluctuating nature of illnesses such as multiple sclerosis.

TRANSPORT

Crime

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total number of reported crimes in (a) north London and (b) south London in each year since 1979 and in each month since 1990; if he will list for each period the number of (i) rapes, (ii) indecent assaults, (iii) other assaults, (iv) violent crimes and (v) robberies; and if he will identify separately assaults on staff and assaults on passengers.

Mr. Freeman: The tables show reported crime on BR and the London underground for London north and London south for the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1994. Comparable figures for the period before April 1992 are not available.

Cones Hotline

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many calls have been received to the cones hotline since its inception; and what are the monthly costs of the line.

Mr. Key: A total of 4,538 calls have been received on the cones hotline up to 18 May. Of these, 2,600 have been complaints about or observations on cones and traffic management at roadworks which have been followed up by the relevant regional office. The remaining calls have comprised general inquiries and requests for information which were dealt with immediately.

Since March this year the cones hotline has operated on a new dedicated number giving callers direct access to the hotline operator. It has also provided for callers to be charged at their local rate irrespective of their location. The new line has been costing about £450 per month, including call charges. All other running costs have been and are being met from within budgets agreed before the hotline was established.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the offices of his Department in (a) Doncaster, (b) Barnsley, (c) Rotherham and (d) Sheffield; and how many posts of each are currently covered by (i) casual, (ii) agency or (iii) fixed-term appointment staff; and what the figures were (1) 24 and (2) 48 months ago.

Mr. Norris: My Department does not employ any agency staff or staff on fixed-term appointments in Doncaster, Barnsley, Rotherham and Sheffield. Past information on agency staff is not kept, so figures are not available. A list of the offices, together with the numbers of casual staff, are as follows.

National Road Traffic Forecasts Review

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the terms of reference for the review of the methodology of the national road traffic forecasts and of the terms of reference of the advisory panel set up to assist this review, the members of the panel with the organisations that they represent, a list of the research that has been or is to be commissioned to assist the review and the date by which the review is expected to be completed.

Mr. Key: I announced to the House on 25 November 1993, Official Report, column 101 that my Department had made arrangements to receive advice from experts in traffic modelling and related fields. Those experts have been brought together to form an advisory group. The group has no formal terms of reference: their business is to advise the Department on the methods appropriate for the preparation of the national road traffic forecasts. This is a new part of our normal practice of keeping the forecasts constantly under review. The Department remains satisfied with the existing published forecasts (NRTF(GB)1989), but always seeks to assess possible improvements to forecasting methodology.

The membership of the group is:

Mr. H. C. S. Derwent, Grade 3, National Roads Policy Division, Department of Transport (Chairman).

Professor Peter Hills, Department of Civil Engineering, University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Mr. Hollingsworth, Chief Economist, Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders.

Mr. D. Humby, Head of Transport Planning, Hertfordshire County Council.

Mr. R. Turner, Executive Director, Transport Planning, Freight Transport Association.

Mr. Peter Mackie, Deputy Director, Institute of Transport Studies, University of Leeds.

Mr. Keith Buchan, Metropolitan Research Unit.

Together with representatives of the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment, HM Treasury, and those in the Department of Transport responsible for the Forecasts.

The members of the group contribute independent expertise; they are not appointed as representatives of any particular interest or group. The group's purpose is to give the Department advice on such technical forecasting issues as are placed before it.

The Department has an on-going programme of research on traffic, car ownership and use. Research let outside the Department particularly relevant to the forecasts includes:

derivation of a database of traffic flows by area, road type, time and purpose; effects of congestion on car and commercial vehicle use;

effects of higher fuel prices on vehicle use.

Further research will be let outside the Department as the need is identified.

The members of the group have been told that their work will last about 18 months, though this will depend on the nature of the issues that arise.

Seat Belts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the technical or engineering obstacles to the introduction of seat belts in minibuses and coaches.

Mr. Key: None. Major manufacturers of minibuses now fit seat belts as standard equipment and coach manufacturers can provide them as an option. Most vehicles can be retrofitted; but there may be technical difficulties in some older vehicles because of the way in which they were originally constructed.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has made to the European Union about the desirability of fitting seat belts in minibuses and coaches.

Mr. Key: Following the Auxerre coach accident in France in 1990, representations were made to the Commission to consider amendment of the relevant directives to allow the fitting of seat belts to all seats in minibuses and coaches. In the light of reaction from member states, the Commission concluded at the time that there was insufficient support for any proposal on these lines to take the matter forward.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what obstacles exist in the European Union to the introduction of seat belts in minibuses and coaches.

Mr. Key: The European Commission has recently announced a strategy for improved bus and coach safety which includes the fitment of seat belts in vehicles which do not carry standing passengers. We await its detailed proposals.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received on the desirability of requiring the introduction of safety belts in minibuses and coaches; and what is his timetable for responding to these.

Mr. Key: I have received over 700 letters from both hon. Members and members of the public on this subject during the last seven months, as well as a large number of telephone calls.

We aim to reply to letters from members of the public within 20 working days of receipt.

Air Cargo Agents

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many applicants have applied for listed agent status under the Aviation Security (Air Cargo Agents) Regulations 1993.

Mr. Norris: A total of 355 applications for listed agent status have been made to my Department.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the applicants for listed agent status provisionally listed under the Aviation Security (Air Cargo Agents) Regulations 1993.

Mr. Norris: Eighty-eight air cargo agents have been listed by my Department. I am placing copies in the Library.

Company Cars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the traffic accidents which involve company-owned cars; and what recommendation he has to improve safety in this area.

Mr. Key: Statistics indicate that the accident claim rate for company owned vehicles is some 60-70 per cent. greater than for privately owned vehicles. We have commissioned research from which we shall assess the potential for introducing measures to reduce the accident liability of fleet vehicles.

Spain-Morocco Ferry Service

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department has taken in recent weeks regarding the repeated refusal of the Spanish authorities to allow Cenargo Ltd. to operate a ferry service to Morocco in accordance with EC regulations.

Mr. Norris: My Department has continued to take every opportunity to raise the matter, both bilaterally with Spain and within the European Community. We understand that the European Commission has decided to open infraction proceedings against Spain in this case under article 169 of the treaty of Rome.

Bus Passes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the working of section 93(7) of the Transport Act 1985 to ensure that eligibility for bus passes is standardised at 60 years of age for both men and women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: At present we have no plans to review the working of section 93(7) of the Transport Act 1985 other than as indicated in the second part of my reply to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 13 May, Official Report column 281.

High Vehicles

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what progress has been made in introducing regulations to require operators of vehicles over 3 m high to display the height of the vehicle in the cab;

(2) from what date he will require operators of vehicles over 4·88 m high to give advance notice to local authorities of their movements;

(3) what progress has been made in introducing regulations to require operators of skips or tipper lorries to provide a warning device in the driving cab to show when the lifting equipment is raised.

Mr. Key: Requirements for operators of vehicles over 3 m in height to display the height of the vehicle in the cab, for operators of skips or tipper lorries to provide a warning device in the cab and for operators of vehicles over 4.88 m high to give advance notice of their movements to local authorities are being considered as part of a package of changes to the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986 to alleviate the problem of “bridge bashing”. We are currently considering a number of points raised by operators in response to consultation on the issue. I cannot therefore give a definite date for implementation.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff in his Department have received their notice in the last month; how many of those were casual staff; and how they were notified.

Mr. Norris: The number of staff who left the Department in April was 147. Of these 81 were permanent staff and 66 were casuals. All staff leaving, for whatever reason, receive their notice in the form of a letter from their personnel officer.

East London Transport Stoppage

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the extent and circumstances of the failure of rail and tube services from east London on 10 May; what estimate he has made of the number of passengers inconvenienced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: I understand from the operators of these services that on 10 May, at about 0700 hours, the overhead power cables at East Ham came down, stopping services on the London, Tilbury and Southend—LTS—line. Fenchurch Street station was closed and all LTS services terminated at Barking until 0530 hours the following day. This incident also resulted in delays to westbound services on London Underground's District line of something in excess of two hours.

We do not have figures for the number of passengers affected by this incident. However, LTS estimates that 25,000 people travel into London on their services each weekday. LUL, which runs westbound District line trains every two to four minutes in the peak hours, tells me that approximately 600 people travel on each peak hour train.

LTS has said that a full inquiry is taking place to establish the cause of this incident.

Railway Franchises

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is Railtrack's liability to passenger franchise operators in the event of a section of track being taken out of service for whatever reason; and what is the extent of that liability;

(2) who is responsible for consequential financial losses incurred by railway franchisees in the event of a railway line being temporarily shut due to track failure or an accident;

(3) what is the role of the Office of the Rail Regulator in intervening in financial liability disputes between Railtrack and passenger franchise operators.

Mr. Freeman: Existing access contracts between Railtrack and BR's train operating units provide for penalty payments to be made by Railtrack in the event of Railtrack's performance falling below predetermined standards, such as where delays are caused by infrastructure failure. They also provide for the abatement of access charges payable by train operators, in accordance with set criteria, in the event of severe disruption. Future access agreements to be negotiated between Railtrack and train operators are likely to include similar arrangements. These agreements will be subject to the approval of the Regulator.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Norris: Nine civil servants employed by the Department and its agencies assert that they have developed work-related upper limb disorders as a result of their employment and have made claims against the Department.

International Rail Services

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what restrictions there will be on international rail services through the channel tunnel arriving at Waterloo international terminal during the monring peak hours; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Hon. Members were informed during the passage of the Channel Tunnel Bill in 1986, that restrictions would apply to morning peak hour international arrivals. The aim was to avoid overcrowding on the underground at Waterloo and inconvenience to travellers.

However, improvements in the facilities for the mainline underground stations at Waterloo and London Underground Ltd. services, mean that the stations will now be able to cope with international passengers arriving during the 0800—0900 peak without inconveniencing other travellers. Consequently European Passenger Services wishes to plan for two Eurostar arrivals to Waterloo international terminal shortly before 0900 on weekdays when full services commence later this year.

European Passenger Services has consulted LUL which is content with this arrangement.

Station Staff, London

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many station staff were employed by British Rail on stations in London in 1980, 1985, 1989, 1991 and 1993.

Mr. Norris: The information requested is as follows (figures as at 31 March):

	Number
1980	4,950
1985	4,490
1989	3,740
1991	3,510
1993	3,170

These figures provided by BR are estimates. They take into account staff movements and assignments within grades—that is, some staff are not permanently based at stations or serve more than one station.

Tankers

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what monitoring has been done of the operation of the voluntary ban on tankers over 10,000 tonnes gross registererd tonnage using the passage between Grassholm and Skomer islands; and how many vessels are known to have broken the ban since it was introduced.

Mr. Norris: None. The Department is unaware of any breaches of the internationally agreed recommendation that large laden tankers should avoid the Grassholm channel. Nevertheless, Lord Donaldson's report, "Safer Ships, Cleaner Seas", announced to the House on 17 May, recommends a traffic survey of the areas for a limited but representative period, and we are considering how best to respond to this recommendation.

Accidents (Children)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many children have died in cycling accidents in each of the last 10 years; and what proposals he has to reduce the number of such fatalities.

Mr. Key [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The information requested is shown in the table. The Department is continually investing time and resources into finding ways to improve safety and convenience for cyclists. The ongoing cycle safe campaign promotes safer cycling and is particularly aimed at children. They are especially encouraged to take proper training. We actively promote the benefits of cycle helmets for children.

The Department is working to harden attitudes to speeding motorists—one of the major causes of accidents for all road users, cyclists or otherwise.

The Department also offers guidance to local highway authorities on the facilities which may be introduced to benefit cyclists.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents in which children died in each of the last 10 years were caused by drinking and driving.

Mr. Key [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The national road accident database includes only objective accident details. It does not include information on the cause of accidents and the information requested is not available. However the following table shows the number of child fatalities in drink-drive accidents during the past 10 years.

London Underground

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the recommendations of the Fennell report into the King's Cross fire which have not yet been implemented; and when he expects them to be implemented.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 20 May 1994]: London Underground Ltd. has now implemented 116 of the 127 recommendations addressed to it in the Fennell report. One recommendation, which was not accepted by LUL, has been completed by other means. This leaves the following recommendations still to be fully implemented:

6a Escalator lubrication
8b Line Controllers facilities
16a Research into air movement
36 Escalators—elimination of wooden treads and risers
49a Station ventilation systems
52a Elimination of VIR cable (infrastructure)
69 Removal of hazardous materials
114 Improvements to CCTV
125 Control of smoke ahd ventilation
142 Subway link at King's Cross

Discussions on how best to deal with these are taking place between Her Majesty's railways inspectorate and London Underground.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which consultants carried out the quantified risk assessment from which his Department concluded that there was little risk of fire as a result of wooden treads on London Underground's escalators; and if he will publish that assessment.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The quantified risk assessment was carried out for London Underground by Trident Consultants Ltd. as part of a comprehensive two-year study of risks on the underground. As the consultants' final report also includes assessments of risks arising from terrorism it is not for general publication. However, I understand that London Underground is willing to give the hon. Lady a briefing on the risks associated with the wooden escalator treads if she would find that helpful.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the ethnic origin of each of the employees of London Underground who experienced an assault while on duty during 1993.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The ethnic origins of the 431 London Underground staff who were victims of either criminal or common assaults in 1993 were as follows:

	Number
UK/Eire	237
Other European	17
Asian	59
African	44
Caribbean	59
Other	15
Total	431

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the range of estimated cost of additions to Westminster underground station occasioned by the Jubilee line extension, excluding any features necessary for the new parliamentary building.

Mr. Norris [holding answer 20 May 1994]: Contracts have been awarded for both the civil and the electrical and mechanical work associated with the new Westminster station. The estimated cost for the work is in the range of £75 million to £80 million. It is not possible separately to identify the effect of the new parliamentary building.

Road Construction Contracts

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the major road construction contracts awarded by his Department worth over £300,000 at current prices, indicating the name of the construction company who was awarded the contract for (a) the year from January 1993 to January 1994 and (b) since February 1994.

Mr. Key: [holding answer 20 May 1994]: Since 1 April, responsibility for managing, maintaining and improving the national road network in England now lies with the Highways Agency. As the information requested by the hon. Member relates to operational matters of the Highways Agency, I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 20 May 1994:

> You put down a Parliamentary Question for answer by the Secretary of State concerning major construction contracts awarded since January 1993.
> As the information requested concerns operational matters for which the Highways Agency is now responsible I am replying to your Question.
> You asked for a list of road construction contracts over £300,000 in value that had been awarded firstly for the period January 1993 to January 1994, and secondly since February 1994, together with the name of the successful contractor.
> The attached lists give the information in relation to contracts valued in excess of £1 million. The Agency does not currently keep central records of contracts below £1 million and I regret this information cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by her Department in 1992-93.

Mr. Jack: The expenditure by my Department—excluding the Intervention Board executive agency—on management and financial consultants in 1992-93 was approximately £2,021,000.

Whales

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement about the International Whaling Commission's study on whale watching.

Mr. Jack: The United Kingdom introduced a resolution on whale watching to the 1993 annual meeting of the International Whaling Commission which was adopted by consensus. This called on IWC members to submit reports on the extent and economic significance of whale-watching operations in their respective countries. Many countries, including the United Kingdom, have submitted reports and these have summarised by the IWC secretariat in a document which is being discussed by the IWC at its current meeting in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico. At this meeting, the United Kingdom delegation is seeking to ensure that the IWC plays a leading role in the development of this growing new industry, which represents an important new way of utilising whale resources.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether she intends to put pressure on the Norwegian Government at the International Whaling Commission in Puerto Vallarta between 23 and 27 May;

(2) what further action she plans if Norway continues to ignore the International Whaling Commission moratorium on whaling.

Mr. Jack: Norway is well aware of the United Kingdom Government's strong opposition to its decision to resume commercial whaling. This has been made clear to the Norwegian Government on numerous occasions and at the highest levels. Although Norway is not legally bound by the IWC moratorium on commercial whaling as, under IWC rules, it lodged an objection to the original decision taken in 1982, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall continue to urge Norway, at the IWC meeting and beyond, to respect fully the terms of the moratorium.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what figures she has for the current levels of International Whaling Commission protected stock;

(2) if she will review the levels of internationally protected stock, particularly the minke whale; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Whale stocks are currently classified by the IWC under the terms of its obsolete new management procedure—NMP. The revised management scheme—RMS—on which the IWC is now working and which incorporates a revised management procedure—RMP—would, if adopted, replace the NMP and would no longer require the formal classification of whale stocks. If the RMP were implemented, zero catch limits would apply to stocks estimated at below 54 per cent. of their pre-exploitation levels. This would be likely to cover the great majority of species of "great" whale.

The IWC currently estimates the stock of minke whales in the Antarctic to number some 750,000 animals. In the north-east Atlantic the most recent estimate available for minke whales, produced by Norway, is of around 87,000 animals; that estimate is currently under review by the IWCL's scientific committee. The position on minke whales in the north Pacific is less clear, as uncertainty exists over stock identities.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the long-term research project at the sea mammal research unit on the effect of environmental change on whales will be complete.

Mr. Jack: The project being funded by my Department at the sea mammal research unit to assess the effects of environmental change on whale populations began in April 1993 for an initial period of three years. The project is therefore due for review in April 1996.

DEFENCE

D-day

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) of 10 May 1994, Official Report, column 127, what representatives of Opposition parties have been invited to the events his Department is organising to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the D-day landings.

Mr. Hanley: The following representatives of opposition parties have been invited:

The Rt. Hon. Mrs. Margaret Beckett
The Rt. Hon. James Molyneux
The Rt. Hon. Stanley Orme
Mr. John Home Robertson
Mr. Frank Cook
Mr. Eddie Loyden
Mr. Don Dixon
Mr. Archie Kirkwood
Rev. Martin Smyth
The Rt. Hon. Paddy Ashdown
Mr. John Denham
Mr. Bruce George
Mr. John McWilliam
Mr. Menzies Campbell CBE QC
Mr. Andrew MacKinlay
The Rt. Hon. Sir David Steel KBE
Mr. William Ross
Mr. Ken Maginnis

Private Members' Bills

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested parliamentary counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct parliamentary counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Hanley: There have been no such occasions.

Departmental Housing

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many empty houses and flats are currently in his ownership within the city of Plymouth boundaries; what steps he will be taking to dispose of them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: As at 31 March 1994, my Department owned 301 vacant houses and flats within the city of Plymouth, of which 296 were service married quarters and five were civilian houses. The majority of those properties were undergoing major maintenance work or were already allocated to service families, and some were in the process of being sold. Where there is no long-term requirement, it is our policy to offer properties for sale to service personnel at a discount, to housing associations or on the open market.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the invitation to tender for the sale of Devonport and Rosyth royal dockyards.

Mr. Aitken: The invitations to tender for the royal dockyards will contain commercially confidential material. It will not therefore be possible to place copies in the Library.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy that the contracts of employment of current employees at Devonport and Rosyth royal dockyards will not be changed after privatisation without the agreement and consent of the employees.

Mr. Aitken: The contracts of employment of current employees of Devonport Royal Dockyard plc and Rosyth Royal Dockyard plc are entirely a matter for the dockyard companies and their employees. The present terms and conditions will continue to apply after the proposed sale of the royal dockyards unless and until changes are agreed between the company then owning each dockyard and its employees or the contracts of employment are terminated.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total cost of the redundancy liability for the work force at each of Devonport and Rosyth royal dockyards.

Mr. Aitken: As the Government plan to continue with two royal dockyards, this is a hypothetical issue. The costs that would be incurred in meeting such a severance liability could be determined only in the full knowledge of all the relevant circumstances applying at the time. Estimates have, however, been made by the Government Actuary, on the basis of information provided by the dockyard contractors, which indicate that the total severance liability for the work forces at Devonport and Rosyth royal dockyards as at 31 March 1994 would have been some £147 million and £101 million respectively, based on the theoretical situation of all staff being made redundant on that date.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects his Department to apply for planning permission for the Trident refit facility at Devonport royal dockyard.

Mr. Aitken: This is currently scheduled for August 1994.

Attack Helicopter

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects an order being placed for an attack helicopter for the armed forces; how many he intends to purchase; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The assessment of the bids received last November in response to the attack helicopter competition is currently under way and the fuller bid from Atlas Aviation is due at the end of September. A final decision is expected in spring of next year and the contract is expected to be in place with the successful contractor by the middle of next year. We intend to order about 90 aircraft, although precise numbers have yet to be determined.

Trident

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will break down the costings involved in the quoted cost of the Trident refitting facilities at Devonport;

(2) what additional costs his Department has identified to the figures so far given for the Trident refitting at Devonport; and what is his estimate of the final cost of the contract.

Mr. Aitken: I refer the hon. member to annexe A of the consultation document "The Royal Dockyards—Future Arrangements for Ship Refitting" issued by my Department on 8 July 1993, and also to my written answer of 15 March 1994, Official Report, column 655. The detailed composition of the quoted cost is commercially confidential.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress made on negotiating the Trident refitting contract with DML.

Mr. Aitken: Contractual arrangements for the refitting of Trident submarines will be a matter for negotiation with the successful bidder for Devonport royal dockyard.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps will be taken to manage closely the fixed-price contract to be placed with DML for Trident refitting facilities.

Mr. Aitken: All necessary steps will be taken to ensure that the project proceeds to time and cost.

Eurofighter

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the expected cost of Eurofighter per unit indicating the variations depending on the numbers ordered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: On the basis of our declared offtake of 250 aircraft out of a production run of 602 aircraft, the current estimated unit production cost is £34 million at 1993 prices.

The unit production cost will vary according to the number of aircraft ordered by each of the four partner nations, the work sharing ratio and the contract prices negotiated.

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of Eurofighter's development programme to date; what assessment he has made of the reasons for the cost overruns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The project cost is reviewed annually. As reported in MOD's major projects report 1993 the development cost was estimated at that time at £3,463 million at 1993 prices. That represents an increase of some £570 million since the project was originally approved. Of this, some £450 million is due to German withdrawal from certain equipments, higher than expected equipment costs and the estimated cost of the reorientated development programme. The remainder reflects a reassessment of the estimated development costs between the dates of ministerial approval—April 1988—and the prices negotiated before the start of development—November 1988. The cost increases are unwelcome but not unexpected for a collaborative project of this complexity and technical sophistication. Negotiations are still in progress with industry over the cost of the reorientated development programme. A new estimate reflecting the expected outcome of these negotiations should be available soon.

Public Bodies

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who are the members currently appointed to the Dartmoor steering group and working party.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 28 January 1994]: The members of the Dartmoor steering group and working party are as follows:

Sir Anthony Barrowclough Kt QC (Chairman)
Mr. P. L. Combes
Councillor R. A. Cook
Lieutenant General A. A. Dennison-Smith MBE
Mr. P. D. Girling
Mr. R. F. T. Halliday
Mr. N. J. Neath
Mr. R. Iles
Mr. H. Kirby
Dr. D. J. Townshend
Colonel J. G. O'N Wells-Cole OBE
Councillor J. P. Wigmore

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who are the members currently appointed to the independent board of visitors for military corrective training centre and Royal Navy detention quarters.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 28 January 1994]: The members of the independent board of visitors for the military corrective training centre and the Royal Navy detention quarters are as follows:

Mr. C. P. Barlow
Miss M. Beattie, MBE, JP, DL
Mr. J. Cann, MP
Mr. J. Denham, MP
Mr. P. Holmes, JP, FCIS
Mr. Lindsey, JP
Mr. D. Martin, MP
Mr. J. W. Pettinger
Mr. T. W. Souter, Dip TP, FRTPI
Mrs. J. Tweed, JP
Brigadier J. Whitehead (Retired)
Dr. D. Withnall, MBBD, MRCGP

Imphal Barracks

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, Official Report, column 394, about the number of square feet of office space of Imphal barracks to be released by the move of Army manning and records offices to Glasgow, what is the notional rental value of this office space per square foot; and what is the notional rental value per square foot of the new office accommodation for Army manning and records staff in Glasgow.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 12 May 1994]: The office accommodation at Imphal barracks is located within the barrack area and, for security reasons, it could not therefore be leased or otherwise disposed of. The question of a notional rental value is therefore not relevant. The investment appraisal for the Army personnel centre did, however, include an opportunity cost, which represented a notional rental value for that part of Kentigern house which would otherwise have been occupied by the APC. Because of commercial confidentiality, this figure cannot be released.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

ECOCON Ventures

Mr. C[illegible]bell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which Ministers in his Department met representatives of ECOCON Ventures and on what dates, in the last 12 months.

Mr. Heseltine: No such meetings have taken place.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date Stoy Hayward Consulting was given copies of documentation on the privatisation of (a) the Insolvency Service and (b) all other Government services.

Mr. Heseltine: Stoy Hayward carried out a study of the potential for involving the private sector more in the mechanical, processing tasks of official receivers following an invitation to bid issued in July 1993. Its remit did not extend to any other Government services.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when reports on the privatisation of the Insolvency Service were made available by his Department to Ian Greer Associates.

Mr. Heseltine: Stoy Hayward produced a report relating to the Insolvency Service. My Department did not make this available to Ian Greer Associates. A summary of the report was supplied to Insolvency Service staff and trade unions and was placed in the Libraries of both Houses. It has also been made available for public inspection in the DTI's Library.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions have taken place between Ministers and representatives of Ian Greer Associates on the question of the privatisation of the Insolvency Service and other Government services.

Mr. Heseltine: No discussions have taken place between Ministers in the DTI and representatives of Ian

Greer Associates on the question of private sector involvement in the work of the Insolvency Service. Nor, as far as I am aware, have any such discussions taken place in relation to any other Government services.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will now place in the Library the consultants' report on the privatisation of the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine: The purpose of Stoy Hayward's study was to examine the ways in which official receivers may concentrate more on their investigatory role by involving the private sector to a greater extent in the mechanical processing work in insolvencies. I do not propose to place the full consultants' report in the Library of the House. The summary already in the Library of the House has been agreed by Stoy Hayward as a fair reflection of its report.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list all those organisations (a) inside and (b) outside Government that have had sight of his Department's report on the future of the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 18 May 1994]: The full report of Stoy Hayward's work on the potential for involving the private sector more in the mechanical, processing tasks of official receivers was seen by DTI Ministers and their immediate staff; relevant Insolvency Service and DTI officials; members of the agency steering board; and relevant Ministers and officials in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and HM Treasury.

A summary of the report was placed in the Libraries of both Houses and also in DTI's library for inspection.

Coal Research Establishment

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has regarding the future of the Coal Research Establishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The future of the Coal Research Establishment is a matter for British Coal.

Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the prospects of privatising the National Environmental Technology centre in the light of the conclusions of the privatisation review of the Atomic Energy Authority.

Mr. Eggar: I announced on 17 February 1994, Official Report, columns 922-24, the Government's intention to privatise the business activities in the AEA's new commercial division—since renamed "AEA Technology" —and that decisions on the form of privatisation would be taken in due course. The National Environmental Technology centre is part of AEA Technology and, as such, is included within the terms of that announcement.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what the closure of Warren Springs laboratory and creation of the National Environmental Technology centre has cost to date.

Mr. Heseltine: The final accounts for Warren Spring Laboratory are in preparation however the net result to date of the closure of the Stevenage site and the creation of the National Environmental Technology centre is expected to be a benefit to the Exchequer of £11 million.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total volume of radioactive waste delivered, in each year since 1979, to (a) AEA Technology and (b) British Nuclear Fuels sites under the Radioactive Substances (Waste Closed Sources) Exemption Order 1962.

Mr. Eggar: The volumes of these wastes received by UKAEA under the national disposal service between 1979 and 1993 were:

Year	Cubic metres
1979	6·00
1980	6·00
1981	6·00
1982	6·00
1983	6·00
1984	7·86
1985	4·23
1986	7·02
1987	6·01
1988	5·43
1989	5·24
1990	2·67
1991	7·45
1992	13·90
1993	20·02

BNFL has received about 0·05 cubic metres of such wastes over the whole of the period.

Competition

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his departmental officials last met representatives of the European Commissioner responsible for competition; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My officials are in regular and frequent contact with the competition directorate-general of the European Commission to discuss a wide range of issues.

Inquiries

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Medway Secondary Metals Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(2) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of British Anzani plc were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(3) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Bank Street Securities Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(4) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Link Service Stations Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(5) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Graylaw Holdings Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Elizabeth Appleby, QC and Peter Wilfred Foss, FCA of Moores Rowland were appointed inspectors in all the companies referred to by the hon. Member. The additional information requested by the hon. Member appears in the table. The same inspectors were also appointed in a related company, Pennine Commercial Holdings plc, where because of criminal proceedings, no final report has yet been signed. When the Pennine Commercial Holdings report has been completed, publication of all reports will be considered.

Company	Date of appointment of inspectors	Date of report	Cost (£)
Link Service Stations Ltd.	11 March 1983	28 November 1989	Accountant = 598,205 Lawyer = 147,439 Total = 745,644
Graylaw Holdings Ltd.	11 March 1983	28 November 1989
British Anzanie plc	11 March 1983	28 November 1986
Bank Street Securities	4 October 1983	28 November 1989
Medway Secondary Metals Ltd.	16 February 1984	21 October 1987

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Euroseas Securities Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Mr. M. A. F. Lyndon Stanford QC and Mr. B. A. Kemp FCA of Saffery Champness were appointed on 4 September 1980. They reported on 5 March 1985 and it was decided in 1987 not to publish their report. The cost of the inspection was £399,741. A breakdown of this figure is no longer available.

Imports (China)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what goods or materials the United Kingdom Government import from China.

Mr. Needham: Information on United Kingdom imports from China is regularly published in "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom." Copies of this publication are available in the Library of the House. Sources of purchases by the Government are not monitored.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what advice or information he has given United Kingdom companies importing from China about the use of labour camps in the production of Chinese goods and materials.

Mr. Needham: I have given no specific advice or information. However, with limited exceptions, the importation into the United Kingdom of goods produced in any foreign prison or like establishment is banned by the Foreign Prison-Made Goods Act 1897, as amended in 1988. Enforcement of the Act is a matter for HM Customs and Excise, which depends on receiving sufficient evidence, specific to the consignment concerned.

Small Company Audit

Mr. Stern: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to issue regulations in respect of the abolition of the small company audit; and when they will come into effect.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My Department has issued a draft of the statutory instrument and invited public comment on the text by 10 June 1994. We intend the legislation to enter into force this summer.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Railway Museum

4. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement about the recent departure of the head of the national railway museum.

Mr. Sproat: The National Heritage Act 1983 lays the responsibility for the management of the national museum of science and industry on its trustees. The new head of the national railway museum, Mr. Andrew Scott, has now been appointed, and I wish him and the museum every success.

D-day

17. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what arrangements are being made to support the commemoration of the [illegible]0th anniversary of D-day in the north of England, with pa[illegible]ular reference to the recognition of the role played by [illegible] of Lancashire regiments in the invasion.

Mr. Sproat: My Department has been in regular touch with the D-day committee in Blackpool to discuss promotion of its commemorative events. These were included in the list of D-day events published at the launch in April of the nationwide programme of popular events.

Tourism

18. Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations he has had about improving training for jobs in the tourist industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: Department of National Heritage Ministers and officials regularly consult with the tourism industry, the English tourist board and other relevant bodies on all tourism issues, including training. Indeed, as my hon. Friend is aware, I met the chairman of the Academy of Food and Wine service earlier this year to learn more about the open learning material that it has developed to train those working within the hospitality industry.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his policy for tourism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: The objectives of the Government's tourism policy are, as set out in my Department's annual report, to create the conditions which will encourage inward and domestic tourism so that the industry can make its full contribution to the economy; and increase opportunities for access to our culture and heritage.

Gardening

19. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what help and encouragement his Department gives to the promotion of gardening as (a) a leisure pursuit and (b) part of the nation's heritage.

Mr. Sproat: Gardening is one of the most popular leisure pursuits. The Department has responsibility, through the Royal Parks Agency, for the royal parks, which contain some nationally famous gardens, providing inspiration, if not help and encouragement, to the gardener.

English Heritage maintains a register of historic parks and gardens and provides grants for their conservation. My Department is also grant-aiding projects being undertaken by the Garden History Society and the National Council for the Conservation of Plants and Gardens.

Orchestral Concerts

20. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for National heritage how many regional orchestral concerts he has attended.

Mr. Brooke: Over the past two years I have had the pleasure of attending 11 orchestral concerts in London and around the country. Only this month, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary attended a concert in Liverpool which he greatly enjoyed.

Cross-media Ownership

21. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has for reviewing the regulations governing cross-media ownership; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I announced on 3 January that I would be reviewing the rules which restrict cross-media ownership. Officials will make recommendations to Ministers this summer. The timing of an announcement about the outcome will depend on a number of factors, including the nature of those recommendations and any legislative implications.

Television Licences (Pensioners)

22. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what most recent consultations he has had over the television licence fee for pensioners.

Mr. Brooke: The Government have historically received a number of requests for pensioners to be given free or reduced-rate television licences, regardless of the ability to pay. The Government are sympathetic to pensioners but do not consider the licence fee a suitable instrument of social policy.

Sport (Disabled People)

23. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what role his Department is undertaking in promoting sport for the disabled.

Mr. Sproat: In 1993-94, the Sports Council provided grants totalling £469,000 to the British Paralympic Association, the British Sports Association for the Disabled and the United Kingdom Sports Association for People with Mental Handicap. The council also works closely with the governing bodies of sport to assist them to become more involved in this area of sport. In addition, disabled sport has benefited from a number of sportsmatch grants.

Press Regulation

24. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he proposes to publish his White Paper on the regulation of the press.

Mr. Brooke: As soon as we have completed our consideration of the issues surrounding the proposed civil remedy and criminal offences. I cannot yet say when that will be.

Museums and Galleries

25. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he collates regarding visitor satisfaction with the national museums and galleries.

Mr. Sproat: Information on levels of satisfaction of visitors to the national museums and galleries is collected by the institutions themselves. My Department does not routinely collect such data. I was, however, pleased to learn from the 1993 National Audit Office report "Quality of Service at the National Museums and Galleries" that, at the five national museums and galleries examined, the overall quality of service was high: 98 per cent. of the visitors surveyed were satisfied or very satisfied.

Mr. Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what improvements have been made to the national galleries in the last six months.

Mr. Sproat: All the national museums and galleries sponsored by my Department undertake a continuous programme of improvements. Notable among the many improvements which have taken place over the past six months are the opening of a new archive and library extension and new gallery at the national portrait gallery, the completion of the latest phase of re-roofing of the Waterhouse building housing the natural history museum, the opening of the new glass gallery at the Victoria and Albert museum and the recently completed phase of stonework and roof repairs at the British museum.

In addition, all national museums and galleries strive continuously to improve their services to visitors, collection management and general efficiency.

Further information on the activities of each of the national museums and galleries is published in my Department's annual report and in the triennial reports published by the institutions themselves.

Privacy

26. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he next expects to meet the European counterparts to discuss measures to limit invasions of personal privacy by the media.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans for any such meetings at present but I will be attending the Culture Council next month.

BBC

27. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consideration he is giving to efficiency improvements in the BBC in the context of the renewal of the BBC charter.

Mr. Brooke: I am taking account of the BBC's continuing efforts to operate more cost-effectively in developing proposals for the corporation's future. Independent consultants, Touche Ross, reporting to me last year, concluded that the BBC has pursued opportunities to make savings and efficiency improvements in a vigorous and effective manner. The BBC is taking further measures to improve its efficiency.

Outdoor Education Centres

28. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations his Department has received regarding the code of practice for outdoor education centres.

Mr. Sproat: Since the hon. Member's question on the accreditation of outdoor centres on 18 April, Official Report, column 624, I have received one representation, which was from the hon. Member.

Sports Council

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what additional administrative expenses will be incurred by the Sports Council in respect of its distribution of 20 per cent. of the national lottery distribution fund.

Mr. Brooke: The staffing, accommodation and IT requirements of the Sports Council in processing lottery applications are currently being costed. Directions issued to the Sports Council under section 26(3) of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 will require it to secure value for money in the administration of lottery funds.

International Sporting Events

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action the Sports Council has taken and is taking to attract major international sporting events to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sproat: The Sports Council assists national governing bodies of sport in attracting major international sporting events. The council has established a major events support group which will hold its inaugural meeting next month. This will provide practical guidance and technical advice on the various tasks and costs involved in bidding for and staging major events. The Sports Council has provided £560,000 in support of a number of major events being held in the United Kingdom this year.

Television Reception

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has on communities of more than 200 people in England which cannot obtain reasonable reception of television programmes.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that there are around 210 communities of 200 or more people in England which do not have a reasonable reception of terrestrial television services.

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proportion of the population of England is unable to receive a reasonable reception of television programmes.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that about 0·4 per cent. of the population of England do not have a reasonable reception of terrestrial television services.

National Lottery

Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many organisations have expressed an interest in running the national lottery.

Mr. Brooke: The Director General of the National Lottery has received eight applications for the section 5 licence to run the national lottery in response to the invitation to apply that he issued on 21 December 1993.

Beaches

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment he has made of the impact of unclean beaches on (a) the internal and (b) the external tourist trade.

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The Government are aware of the current concern about unclean beaches and of the importance of clean beaches to encourage the tourist trade to resort areas. It is naturally in the resorts' interest to work towards cleaner and more accessible beaches. This is recognised in part by the Department of the Environment's commitment to the Tidy Britain Group.

The TBG administers the United Kingdom seaside awards. Its primary functions are to help raise standards of cleanliness, hygiene and environmental management at beaches and also to provide a comprehensive and free public information service for beach users. All seaside award resort beaches must meet 28 land-based criteria—fewer for rural beaches—as well as attaining at least the mandatory water quality laid down by the EC directive on bathing water. A premier seaside award indicates guideline water quality—better than the mandatory standard—as well as the fulfilment of all land-based criteria. Some 137 beaches in the United Kingdom received seaside awards in 1993.

As the awards suggest, there is a serious commitment to ensuring the cleanliness of beaches. It is estimated that around 50 per cent. of Britons holidaying in the United Kingdom take their breaks at seaside resorts. This demonstrates the continuing appeal of the traditional seaside holiday and is something which the English tourist board has encouraged in the past few years by promoting resorts through its seaside campaign. Statistics on the number of overseas visitors who go to seaside resorts are not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Corporation Expenditure (North Yorkshire)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent in North Yorkshire by the Housing Corporation in 1993-94; and what is its budget for North Yorkshire in 1994-95.

Sir George Young: In 1993-94, the Housing Corporation spent £15,764,153 in North Yorkshire.

The Housing Corporation cannot, at this stage, give an exact figure for the 1994-95 budget for North Yorkshire. However, the total cost of housing association schemes which the Housing Corporation expects to approve in North Yorkshire in 1994-95 is £11,926,000; approximately half of this is expected to be spent in 1994-95. In addition, the corporation forecasts that in 1994-95 they will spend £8,147,000 on existing schemes in North Yorkshire. Therefore, the total Housing Corporation budget for North Yorkshire in 1994-95 is estimated to be in the region of £14 million.

"This Common Inheritance"

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many copies of the third year report on the environmental White Paper "This Common Inheritance" (Cm 2549) have been published; at what cost; to whom copies have been distributed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: HMSO published 6,000 copies. The Department of the Environment purchased 2,000 of those and the remainder are on sale from HMSO. So far, the Department has distributed about 1,700 copies to Parliament, overseas Governments, central Government Departments and agencies, local authority associations, businesses and a wide range of special interest groups and academic institutions. At present, the estimated total cost to Government including both direct payment to the Department's designers and purchase from HMSO is about £52,000. In addition, we produced a summary not for publication but for free distribution.

Development Programme

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total amount of moneys in the approved development programme since its inception at (a) cash prices and (b) current prices.

Sir George Young: Housing associations, funded through the Housing Corporation, are now the main providers of new social housing. Below is the total amount of moneys in the Housing Corporation's approved development programme, gross, in cash and current prices for each year since its inception in 1981-82.

	Cash prices £ million	Current (ie. 1993-94) prices £ million

[1] Housing Market Package

In addition, between 1987-88 and 1994-95 the approved development programme has levered in over £3·6 billion in private finance.

Portable Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 6 May, Official Report, column 650, what was the cost of calls made on (a) car and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94.

Mr. Baldry: The cost of calls for car and portable telephones for each business unit is included with those of the other telephone services and, regrettably, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the housing capital expenditure of all local authorities in each year since 1980-81 at (a) cash prices and (b) current prices.

Sir George Young: Local authority gross housing capital expenditure in England, from 1980-81 to 1993-94, was:

£ million

	Cash	[2]1993-94 prices
1980-81	2,729	5,669
1981-82	2,632	4,985

[3] Provisional.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total amount of moneys made available to all local authorities for housing capital expenditure in each year since 1980-81 through (a) capital grants and (b) borrowing approvals at (i) cash prices and (ii) current prices.

Sir George Young: Central Government capital provision for local authority housing capital expenditure in England, from 1980-81 to 1993-94, was:

£ million

	Capital grants[1]		Borrowing approvals[2]
	Cash prices	1993-94 prices[3]	Cash prices	1993-94 prices[3]

New social housing in England is now mainly provided by housing associations rather than local housing authorities.

Notes:

[1] Outturn figures unless otherwise stated. Comprising specified capital grants and other housing capital grants. Before 1990, grants were paid to support loan charges incurred by local authorities in borrowing for the payment of private sector renewal grants. Estimates comparable with capital grants paid under the present system are available only for 1985-86 to 1989-90.

[2] Outturn figures unless otherwise stated. Including Estate Action which forms part of the Single Regeneration Budget for 1994-95 onwards. Figures for 1990-91 onwards comprise the housing contribution to authorities' all-service basic credit approvals and housing supplementary credit approvals. Figures for years before 1990-91 are on a comparable basis, comprising HIP allocations including retrospective borrowing approvals.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each local authority (a) the amount spent on council housing repairs and maintenance and (b) the number of council-owned properties; and what was the average spent by local authorities on repairs and maintenance per council-owned property for each year since 1991-92.

Sir George Young: The information available to my Department from local authorities' returns has been placed in the Library. Based on those returns, my Department's estimates of the average amount spent on repairs and maintenance for the three years requested is £509, £545 and £595 per dwelling.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 170, what increase in borrowing will be required to pay for the costs of local government reorganisation in Humberside; and what plans he has to indicate this at each stage of reorganisation as it is introduced into Parliament.

Mr. Curry: The amount of borrowing required will depend, among other things, on what new structure is adopted. The Local Government Commission, in its report on the options for reorganisation in Humberside, gives an analysis of the costs derived from local authority figures as a basis for decisions on the future structure. Following Parliament's decision, authorities that are to be reorganised will be asked to submit updated figures of the transitional costs and the savings and receipts that they estimate will arise each year. Those will provide the basis for annual limits on the amount of borrowing approvals that the Department will grant. The limits will be issued to authorities before the beginning of each financial year.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 120 (1) if he will set out the calculations of savings and receipts on which he bases his statement that borrowings and the interest payable thereon for the cost of local government reorganisation can be paid back;

(2) what assumptions he made when issuing an assurance on costs of local government reorganisation, on the levels of redundancy and transfer arrangements and costs; and when he will be in a position to give estimates of these costs.

Mr. Curry: The Government's policy guidance to the Local Government Commission asks it to take all feasible steps to assess all the costs and benefits of options being considered. Its estimates are based on figures provided by the local authorities and are published together with the Commission's recommendations. The estimates in the reports submitted to date show that in most cases the savings and receipts should be sufficient to pay back the transitional costs of reorganisation and interest. There would need to be exceptional non-financial benefits to justify approving a reorganisation for which the savings and receipts were not expected to pay off the transitional costs, including interest.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from his Icelandic counterpart since 15 December 1993 in regard to the consents given to British Nuclear Fuels to open the thermal oxide reprocessing plant.

Mr. Atkins: The Secretary of State met with Icelandic Environment Minister on 23 March 1994. A number of subjects, including THORP, were discussed at that meeting.

Parish Polls

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those parish polls which have been conducted since 1979, together with their subject matter in each case.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not held centrally.

Marine Conservation

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will introduce legislation to allow Government agencies to regulate the activities of harbour authorities in marine nature reserves;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to allow Government agencies to control navigation and fisheries within the boundaries of marine nature reserves established under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Atkins: The Government have no such plans for marine nature reserves. However, the Government will shortly be laying regulations which will provide for the selection, protection and management of special areas of conservation under the EC habitats directive. Those regulations will place a duty on harbour, navigation and fisheries authorities to undertake their responsibilities in accordance with the requirements of the directive in relation to such areas.

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to protect vulnerable sea areas around the United Kingdom coast and to provide for their integrated management.

Mr. Atkins: The Government will shortly be laying regulations, under the European Communities Act 1972, which will provide for the selection, protection and management of special areas of conservation under the EC habitats directive. A number of those areas will be in the marine environment.

Last October, the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office issued discussion papers on coastal management and control of development below the low-water mark, which looked at the broader issues relating to the management of the coastal zone. We are considering the responses.

Boreholes

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, columns 395-6, what is the legal liability for damage to neighbouring property of water authorities which are negligent in sinking boreholes, irrespective of powers conferred under the Water Industry Act 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The legal position of a water undertaker which abstracts water from a borehole on the undertaker's own land, in circumstances where no abstraction licence or works order is required, is no different from the law applicable to any other landowner who lawfully abstracts water from land. English law distinguishes between two kinds of underground water: water flowing in a certain and definite channel and percolating water. Only water which flows in a known and definite channel can be the subject of property or riparian rights. Whereas at common law the owner of land has the right to have the surface of his land supported by minerals on or under his neighbour's land, there is no equivalent right to have the surface of his land supported by water; nor does he have any rights in respect of water running in undefined channels, except to sink wells and so obtain a supply of water.

Unless a duty of care is established there is no liability for negligence. Since the owner of land has no right of support from underground water flowing in undefined channels, he cannot show that a neighbouring landowner owes him a duty of care not to abstract that water and so remove support from his own land, unless the loss of support is due to the removal of minerals, such as wet sand, running silt or dissolved rock salt.

Sheffield City Council

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his decision on the final cap for Sheffield city council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend has laid before the House a draft order, under section 57 of the Local Government Finance Act 1992, setting out our decision on the final cap for Sheffield city council, which had challenged its proposed cap and put forward a higher alternative. We have considered very carefully all the available relevant information, including the case made by the authority in support of a higher cap, before taking our decision. We have concluded that some relaxation in the proposed cap for Sheffield would be justified and have decided to increase its cap by £3 million.

The final cap for Sheffield is £381·65 million. This cap is, in our view, reasonable, appropriate and achievable in all the circumstances of Sheffield.

City-centre Investment

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage new investment in town and city centres.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 18 May 1994]: Through our planning policy guidance and other publications, we are encouraging vital and viable town centres in which developers will want to invest. Success is likely to depend on partnerships bringing together the relevant public agencies and residents, retailers, property owners and investors to develop a positive strategy.

In addition, one aim of the city challenge initiative is to make city and town centres more attractive to businesses and residents. Town centre redevelopments are a significant element in approximately a third of city challenge partnerships. They should attract nearly £350 million in private sector investment to city and town centres.

The single regeneration budget can also support local proposals including measures which further encourage investment in town centres.

Bathing Water Directive

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which beaches in England are classified as unsuitable for bathing.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 20 May 1994]: None of our identified bathing waters are classified as unsuitable for bathing but bathers should heed local warnings provided on wind, wave and tidal conditions.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the progress of the National Rivers Authority in complying with the European bathing water directive.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The NRA continues to report on a steady improvement in compliance. In 1993, four out of five bathing waters in England and Wales were better than the relevant EC standards. There are schemes under way to bring virtually all the remainder up to standard by the end of next year.

Vehicle Emissions

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the contribution petrol containing the detergent petrol additives which are able to clean the combustion chamber as well as the intake valves and the fuel injectors will make towards the Government's overall aim of improving air quality in the United Kingdom; and if he will recommend the use of such petrol by the public sector, including the Government car service.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 20 May 1994]: None. The British standard for petrol does permit the use of performance enhancer additives but it is up to the individual oil company to substantiate such claims.

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effect of the adoption of petrol containing the detergent petrol additives which clean the combustion chamber as well as the intake valves and the fuel injectors on the level of vehicle emissions.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 20 May 1994]: None.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Lloyd Pacifico

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how long and in what circumstances the Lloyd Pacifico has been arrested in the Port of Tilbury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lloyd Pacifico was arrested at Tilbury by the Admiralty marshal on 16 April 1994. The action was instituted by the Admiralty court on behalf of Reparacoes Navais Do Tejo LDA of Portugal in respect of a claim against a sister ship of the Lloyd Pacifico, the Rio Negro, for alleged unpaid costs of repairs carried out between October and December 1993 in the sum of US$677,000.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many seamen and ship's officers remain in the Port of Tilbury as a consequence of the arrest of the Lloyd Pacifico.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Thirty officers and crew are presently aboard the Lloyd Pacifico.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the entitlement of seamen serving on the Lloyd Pacifico to payment of wages.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The seamen are entitled to the payment of wages. If they are not receiving them, they may make a claim against the vessel through the court. Should the vessel be sold by the Admiralty marshal, the crew will have a high priority against the proceeds of the sale. If an order for sale is made, it is usual for the crew to be repatriated.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations have been made to the Government of Brazil about their obligations as owners of the Lloyd Brasileiro shipping line to the creditors of that company.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Admiralty court has no knowledge of any such representations to the Brazilian Government.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department under what powers the Lloyd Brasileiro shipping line vessel, the "Lloyd Pacifico", is being detained at the port of Tilbury.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lloyd Pacifico is detained at the port of Tilbury under sections 20 (2) and 21 (4) (ii) of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what United Kingdom agencies have made contact with the seamen of the Lloyd Pacifico in order to ensure that their rights and welfare are protected.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Admiralty marshall is in frequent contact with the vessel's agents at Tilbury on various matters including the crew's welfare. He has also met members of the crew to assure them that food and other necessary supplies would be provided for their comfort.

SCOTLAND

Tuberculosis

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many deaths were from tuberculosis in each year since 1988;

(2) if he will give the number of notifications of tuberculosis in each year between 1987 and 1993.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Deaths from Tuberculosis in Scotland

Mental Health Services

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he intends to take on the recommendations of the health committee on the care of people who are seriously mentally ill.

Mr. Stewart: The Government are currently considering the report of the Select Committee on Health entitled "Better off in the Community? The care of people who are seriously mentally ill". The Select Committee did not address the situation in Scotland, but the Scottish Office will take its report into account in the development of policy concerning the care of the mentally ill.

Universities (Advertising)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each university the amount spent on advertising and promotion in the last year for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter for each university or higher education institution to decide. The information requested is not collected or available centrally.

"Shaping the New Councils"

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 324, what restrictions were placed by Councillor William Petrie in respect of the publication of his response to the consultative document on local government.

Mr. Stewart: Councillor Petrie did not submit a response to the consultation paper "Shaping the New Councils".

Travellers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the interested parties he proposes to consult in relation to his review of the role, membership and functions of the Secretary of State's Advisory Committee on Scotland's Travelling People;

(2) if he will make a statement concerning his review of the work of the advisory committee on travellers in Scotland;

(3) what proposals he has to provide financial assistance to bona fide travellers' organisations to provide and develop sites where local authorities or landowners have been, or are, unable to offer such facilities during the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The review of the work of the advisory committee on Scotland's travelling people, to be undertaken before the committee's three-year term of office expires at the end of 1994, is in its very early stages, and no decisions have yet been taken about external consultation. The review will include consideration of grant assistance for the provision of sites.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the capital budget and actual spend on the provision of grant aid for the establishment and modernisation of travellers' sites in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93 and (c) 1993-94 and the estimated expenditure in the year 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

	(1) Vote provision £ million	(2) Outturn £ million
1991-92	2·327	1·850
1992-93	2·385	2·372
1993-94	2·445	[1]1·060
1994-95	2·506	[2]2·506

[2] Estimated outturn.

The figures in column 1 represent the Department's best estimate in advance of each year of the value of work in progress during the year, or completed in previous years which will be subject to claims for payment by local authorities.

The figures in column 2 represent actual claims met during the year. Claims for payment can be affected by delays in the completion of work, in the submission of claims, in audit certification, and by agreed contractual retention moneys.

Community Care

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the role of the Mental Welfare Commission regarding community care policies for the mentally ill; and what changes he is considering in this role.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The functions and duties of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland are set out in part II of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984. The Act places a general duty on the commission to exercise protective functions in respect of mentally disordered people who are, or may be, incapable of adequately protecting their persons or interests. In the exercise of that duty, the commission is constantly monitoring the implementation of the community care policies as they affect individuals with a mental disorder.

TREASURY

Inland Revenue, Wakefield

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the future of Inland Revenue offices in Wakefield.

Mr. Dorrell: Like the rest of the civil service the Inland Revenue has a strong commitment to achieving further significant improvements in service to the public, in operational effectiveness and in cost efficiency. To achieve these objectives the Revenue has embarked on a major programme of change. The first part of the programme is already under way and involves restructuring the Inland Revenue's local office network.

The controller of the South Yorkshire regional executive office is considering moving work from the tax office in Wakefield to a restructured office in Barnsley. The proposal is currently being evaluated to ensure that it is cost efficient and provides a good quality service to the public.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff are employed by the Inland Revenue in Wakefield.

Mr. Dorrell: There are 72 staff employed by the Inland Revenue in Wakefield.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has of the costs which would be incurred in transferring Inland Revenue offices out of Wakefield;

(2) if he will make a statement on the future standard of services available for persons in Wakefield provided by the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Dorrell: Further detailed work is required before a decision can be made on this proposal, but preliminary estimates suggest that it offers considerable financial savings as well as the opportunity to offer a better quality service to the taxpayer.

Agricultural Compliance Unit

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the number of gang masters operating in Lincolnshire in the last 12 months of which the agricultural compliance unit is aware.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue's agricultural compliance unit is aware of about 700 gang masters based in Lincolnshire.

Tax Increases

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 12 May, Official Report, column 224, if he will specify the representations he has received since 1 April regarding increases in taxation.

Mr. Dorrell: I receive representations on many aspects of taxation. It would not be practicable to identify separately those concerned with increases in taxation.

Public Expenditure Survey

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the Treasury guidelines to the 1994 public expenditure survey round.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 20 May 1994]: No.

ENVIRONMENT

European Better Environment Awards

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which United Kingdom companies were recognised in the European better environment awards for industry awards ceremony in Copenhagen on 9 May.

Mr. Atkins: A winner in the eco-product category was Pilkington Glass Ltd., St. Helens. Highly recommended United Kingdom entrants were: Stanhope Properties plc, London (Good Environmental Management category); Wade Furniture Ltd., Leeds (Environmental Technology Transfer category); and BEWT (Water Engineers) Ltd., Alcester, and Ricoh UK Products Ltd., Telford (both recovery of waste category). The United Kingdom's total of five finalists out of 18 finalists in all was the largest from any EU member state.

Non-domestic Rating

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals were outstanding against the 1990 non-domestic rating lists on 31 March in each year since 1991.

Mr. Gummer: The numbers of 1990 non-domestic rating appeals outstanding with English valuation tribunals each year on 31 March were—to the nearest thousand—582,000 in 1991; 558,000 in 1992; 412,000 in 1993; and 259,000—provisional figure—in 1994. These figures take account of all appeals received in valuation tribunals since the rating lists came into force.

Local Government Act 1992

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from (a) local authorities, (b) local authority associations, (c) the Audit Commission, (d) publishers of free newspapers and (e) others about the requirement in the Local Government Act 1992 to publish local authority performance indicators in a paid-for newspaper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have received a number of representations form local government, the Audit Commission, and others, including publishers of free newspapers, that the requirement of the Local Government Act 1992 for information on local authority performance indicators to be published in a paid-for newspaper should be modified to allow publication in free newspapers. We are concerned to ensure that information about an authority's performance has the widest possible circulation in the local community, and hence we are carefully considering these representations with the view, if necessary, of seeking at a convenient opportunity amending legislation to the 1992 Act.

Sizewell B

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new information he has received to update paragraph 15·4 of the third-year report of "This Common Inheritance", Cm. 2549, concerning the progress made in commissioning the Sizewell B nuclear plant.

Mr. Atkins: Her Majesty's chief inspector of pollution and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are undertaking public consultation on whether the operation of Sizewell B is justified; that is, whether any detriment from the discharge of radioactive waste would be outweighed by the overall advantage. The consultation began on 19 May and is due to finish on 16 June.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what date he has set for receipt from the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee, of its views on the options for waste substitution in the return of reprocessing radioactive waste to foreign countries of origin.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 18 January, Official Report, column 567.

Local Government (European Conference)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who represented the Government at the 10th session of the conference of European Ministers responsible for local government in The Hague on 15 and 16 September 1993.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend, the Minister for Local Government and Planning.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the report on local referendums prepared by the steering committee on local and regional authorities for the 10th conference of European Ministers responsible for local government.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend, the Minister for Local Government and Planning, made it clear at the conference that it is for local authorities to decide for themselves whether to hold referendums on particular issues. This remains the Government's view.

DSS Hostels

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what size of hotel will be required to register as a DSS hostel under the new regulations;

(2) when he expects to publish the new regulations concerning the registration of hotels and bed-and-breakfast establishments which now accommodate DSS benefit claimants;

(3) what criteria he will include when determining which bed-and-breakfast establishments will require registration;

(4) which Department will be responsible for the registration of DSS hostels.

Mr. Baldry: As my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister indicated on 5 May, Official Report, column 843, we are considering introducing a licensing scheme for hostels. We are currently considering how such a scheme might operate, and to which properties it might apply. Any scheme will require primary legislation.

Privatisation (Consultants)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 9 May, Official Report, column 70, if he will provide such information as is available on the cost of employing consultants in connection with privatisation programmes.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 13 May 1994]: The cost of employing consultants for privatisation is available centrally for only some programmes completed prior to 1992-93 and is approximately £26 million. All but £70,000 of this expenditure was due to the privatisation of the water authorities which generated net proceeds of £3,594·4 million. The remainder has been incurred in respect of the pending Docklands light railway privatisation.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

E-mail

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish the E-mail address of each Government Department and agency.

Mr. Waldegrave: Departments and agencies who wish to receive mail in any of the electronic forms currently available are able to include details in their entries in the list of ministerial responsibilities or the civil service year book, or in their own departmental material. It is for Departments and agencies to judge whether it is valuable to them to receive correspondence in this way.

Open Government

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will develop plans to create more openness in Government by publishing Government press releases and other information on a free access electronic news or bulletin board system.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Central Office of Information's HERMES database of Government press releases is already available to the public via a number of on-line services. Charges for access are determined by the database hosts. I have no plans to examine the feasibility of setting up a bulletin board system for free public access. Distribution of press notices to the public is a matter for individual Government Departments.

Government Information

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what arrangements have been made for the distribution of material publicising the code of practice on access to Government information.

Mr. David Davis: A leaflet has been produced explaining the operation of the code, giving a contact point for further information and mentioning the telephone inquiry service on 0345 223242.

To coincide with the launch of the code in April, the Central Office of Information wrote to public libraries, college and university libraries, citizen's advice bureaux, independent advice centres and law centres inviting them to stock the leaflet. By 17 May there had been a very encouraging positive response rate of 15 per cent. This means that 52,500 copies of the leaflet explaining how to apply for information under the code of practice have now been distributed to some 1,300 outlets.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

D-day

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what events his Department has itself organised to commemorate the D-day landings; what other events are included in the co-ordinated plans; and which Members of political parties have been invited to these events.

Mr. Sproat: In April, the Department of National Heritage arranged a launch of the popular programme of D-day commemorative events and a memorial in Grosvenor square to which members of the main Opposition parties were invited. It is organising a "Tribute to the Normandy Campaign" family day in Hyde Park on 14 August. An invitation list has not yet been drawn up, but members from the main parties will be included. There are some 700 separate events being organised by others in different parts of the country.

Sport

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what contribution his Department is making by way of finance and expertise in the development of sports coaching, sports science and sports medicine in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sproat: These activities are not supported directly by my Department but by the Sports Council, which it sponsors. I understand that the principal planned Sports Council grants in 1994-95 are as follows:

	£ million
National Coaching Foundation	1·5
Sports Science	0·7
National Sports Medicine Institute	0·6

Television

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what priority he intends to give to digital technology in relation to the licensing of future television services.

Mr. Brooke: The Government will continue to look at how best to take advantage of the opportunities this technology offers. Studies are continuing into the feasibility of launching an analogue Channel 5 without prejudicing the development of digital terrestrial television in the United Kingdom, and an announcement on this issue will be made before long. These studies are based on technical work which has recently become available. The relevant sentence in the "Competitiveness" White Paper is overtaken by this answer.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Proscribed Drugs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to include (a) khat, (b) gamma hydroxybutyrate, and (c) ketamine hydro-chloride on the list of the proscribed drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans at present to schedule these substances under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. The key criterion in the 1971 Act is whether the misuse of a substance has or is capable of having harmful effects sufficient to constitute a social problem. The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs considered the misuse of khat in 1988 and ketamine in 1992 against this criterion and reached the view that bringing them within the 1971 Act controls would not be appropriate.

We are keeping the situation in respect of all three substances under review.

Immigration Rules

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make changes in the immigration rules.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend yesterday laid before Parliament a statement of changes in the immigration rules. The new rules will come into effect on 1 October. The format of the rules has been revised to make them easier for applicants, practitioners and staff to use. The changes of policy which I announced last July, when a consultation document was published, have been incorporated, including the removal of sexually discriminatory provisions, the creation of a new category of investor, and changes in the rules relating to working holidaymakers. A statement listing and explaining all the changes is available in the Vote Office.

Secure Training Centres

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now publish details of the operating specification of the proposed secure training centres for young offenders.

Mr. Maclean: I have today placed a copy of the operating specification and associated paper on staff selection, training, qualifications and certification in the Library of the House.

Sex Offenders

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convicted sex offenders who were sentenced to life imprisonment in each of the last 20 years have now been released from prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is in the table.

Sex offenders sentenced to life imprisonment, received into a Prison Service establishment in England and Wales who were released on licence by 31 December 1993[1]

Year of reception	[2]Number of sex offenders received, sentenced to life imprisonment	Number of sex offenders released by end 1993 by year of reception

1991	17	—
1992	16	—
1993	16	—

[1] Provisional figures.

[2] Of these 23 have been transferred to hospital or to a Prison Service establishment outside England and Wales and 30 have been discharged on appeal.

Marriage of Convenience

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the definition of marriage of convenience referred to in the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We regard a marriage of convenience as a sham marriage entered into solely for immigration purposes where neither partner has the intention of living permanently with the other as man and wife in a settled and genuine relationship.

Bait-digging

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 23 March, Official Report, column 219, when he now expects to reply to Alnwick district council's representations to him of 12 March 1993 about bait-digging.

Mr. Charles Wardle: A substantive reply was sent to the Council on 23 May, following careful consideration of the legal issues involved.

Ballot Papers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those European Union countries that provide ballot papers in local, national and European elections in Braille or a similar system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not available. I shall make inquiries and write to the hon. Member.

Turkish Workers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific measures have been adopted to comply with the obligation of the United Kingdom Government under article 6(3) of decision 1/80 of the association council established in accordance with the Turkey-EC association agreement 1963 to establish under national rules the procedures relating to the rights of residence of Turkish workers in the United Kingdom; and what plans he has to include such mandatory measures in the next consolidation of the immigration rules to be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We have no plans to change the immigration rules in this respect. We consider our procedures under them to conform with the requirements of article 6 of Association Council Decision 1/80.

Roadside Cameras

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of moving traffic offenders detected by roadside cameras are not apprehended; and what assessment he has made of the reasons.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The figure requested is not available. It is for the police to decide on the basis of the photographic evidence whether they wish to take action in a particular case.

EEA Immigration Order

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the definition of vocational training under the proposed Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The term vocational training is drawn from article 1 of Council Directive 93/96/EEC which refers to a student as being:

> "enrolled in a recognised educational establishment for the principal purpose of following a vocational training course".

In accordance with a judgment of the European Court of Justice vocational training is interpreted very widely in this context to include all forms of higher education and any education which prepares for a qualification or provides the necessary training and skills for a profession, trade or employment even if the training programme includes an element of general education.

Prisons (HIV/AIDS)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the distribution of condoms in prisons in order to combat the spread of HIV/AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 23 May 1994]: Responsibilty for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 24 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about representations concerning the distribution of condoms in prisons in order to combat the spread of HIV/AIDS.

The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs recommended in their 1993 report on AIDS and drug misuse that condoms be made available to prisoners in order to combat the spread of HIV/AIDS. The Prison Service Health Advisory Committee has now also recommended that condoms be made available for use by prisoners in England and Wales in its comments on the 1992-93 report of the Prison Service Director of Health Care. In addition, the Prison Service is considering a report from the Prison Service AIDS Advisory Committee on HIV in Prisons in which recommendations were made about condoms and cleaning materials.

Procedural guidelines issued to prison governors in November 1991 advised that the period leading up to release is an important time for educational measures and for individual counselling of HIV infected prisoners and others with lifestyles which suggest that they themselves may be at risk or that they may be a risk to other people. The guidelines also recommended that governors introduce schemes under which all prisoners released—and perhaps those going on home leave—have discrete access to a small supply of free condoms. The Prison Service is reviewing HIV/AIDS policy generally, including the policy on the issue of condoms.

PRIME MINISTER

Post Office Privatisation

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer from the President of the Board of Trade of 17 May, Official Report, column 389, if he will institute an inquiry to establish the source of the leak which disclosed the President's preferred option for Post Office privatisation.

The Prime Minister: We are considering whether a leak inquiry would be justified.

Stephan Adolphus Kock

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister what duties Stephan Adolphus Kock has performed for (a) the Prime Minister, (b) the Ministry of Defence, (c) the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, (d) the Department of Trade and Industry and (e) any other Department between 1964 and 1979; and in which countries overseas each of these duties was carried out.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Kock performed no official duties for any Government Department during the period 1964-79. It remains the Government's policy not to comment on the contacts which an individual may or may not have had with the security and intelligence agencies.

Baroness Thatcher (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what meetings were held by the former Prime Minister and her officials with representatives of the Indonesian Government during her visit to Indonesia in April 1985; and what issues were discussed at each of those meetings.

The Prime Minister: During her visit to Indonesia in April 1985, my right hon. and noble Friend and her officials met President Soeharto, the Foreign Minister, the Minister for Research and Technology, the Minister for Education, 10 Cabinet Ministers concerned with the economy, the governor of West Java and the director of the British Council. Issues discussed included oil prices, technical co-operation, China, Cambodia, East Timor, defence and economic, developmental and international matters.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what meetings were held with representatives of the Thai Government by the former Prime Minister and her officials during her visit to Thailand in August 1988; and what issues were discussed at each of those meetings.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and noble Friend and her officials met the outgoing Prime Minister, General Prem Tinsulanonda, his successor, General Chatichai Choonhavan, deputy Prime Minister, Admiral Sonthee Boonyachai, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Air Chief Marshal Siddhi Savetsili. My right hon. and noble Friend also had an audience with His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej and Her Majesty Queen Sirikit.

The situation in Cambodia was the main focus of the discussions. Other issues covered included trade, drug co-operation, defence, education, and regional economic and developmental matters.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister what meetings were held by the former Prime Minister and her officials with representatives of the Jordanian Government during her visit to Jordan in September 1985; and what issues were discussed at each of those meetings.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and noble Friend held meetings with King Hussein, Crown Prince Hassan and Prime Minister Zeid Rifai. Discussions with the King and the Jordanian Prime Minister concentrated on the Arab/Israel question, and those with the Crown Prince on the Jordanian economy.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 24 May.

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 24 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what costs have been incurred by the Child Support Agency in hotel accommodation and services provided to staff since the agency was established.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 23 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about hotel and accommodation costs incurred by the Child Support Agency.

Such costs are charged to different budgets, for example training or travel and subsistence, depending on the nature of the expenditure.

To establish the hotel cost element from the various budgets and provide the information you require would involve detailed clerical analysis of all staff expenses claims and payments made over the past year at the Agency's headquarters, centres and some of the district offices. This would involve disproportionate cost to the Agency.

I am sorry I cannot be more helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information he has available to show the number of parents with care whose incomes have increased as a result of Child Support Agency involvement in maintenance arrangements.

Mr. Burt: It is not possible to collate this information from records held by the Department.

The Child Support Agency does not collect maintenance on behalf of the parent with care—PWC—in all the cases where it has assessed the level of maintenance to be paid. Where the agency is not providing a collection service there is no record of the amount or frequency of payments made and therefore no record of whether the overall income of the PWC has increased.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) when he proposes to conduct a review of the progress of the new one-stop initiative; if he will publish the results; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many Benefits Agency offices are at present running the new one-stop initiative;

(3) what cost has been incurred in moving towards the new Benefits Agency one-stop initiative.

Mr. Burt: The introduction of a one-stop service for Benefits Agency customers is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Peter Pike, dated 23 May 1994.

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about the One Stop initiative.

As you know, the Secretary of State for Social Security announced on 9 September last year a national programme to move, by July 1994, towards a One Stop service for all the benefits processed by the Benefits Agency. I wrote to you on 27 April 1994 with some information on the progress at that stage. By July, all Benefits Agency Districts will be expected to offer customers a One Place service.

The One Place Programme will mean that customers will be able to:

obtain advice and information on all benefits from their local Benefits agency office;

lodge a claim for any Benefits Agency benefit at a local office (regardless of where that benefit is processed), report a change of circumstance and receive reliable advice about the claim to benefit from that local office.

Progress is being monitored by local Managers and the central project team and a report on One Stop will be published in the Benefits Agency Annual Report and Business Plan in the normal way. Progress so far has been encouraging; in January of this year, for example, approximately 90 per cent of District offices were able to offer customers advice on the range of benefits, including in work benefits such as Family Credit.

The Benefits Agency agreed to implement the improvements in service from within our existing total resource allocation, although by the prioritization of other tasks we were able to give Districts additional funds for training. The pace of future developments will, of course, depend on the level of resources available.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Lung Conditions

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how frequently the instruments used by the medical boards for lung function tests are monitored to ensure uniformity of standards;

(2) when was the last review of the instruments used by the medical boards for lung function tests; and what was the conclusion.

Mr. Scott: The administration of medical boards is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Michael Clapham, dated 23 May 1994:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about the instruments used by Medical Boards for lung function tests.

The most recent review of the type of instrument used by the Adjudicating Medical Authorities (Medical Boards) was in March 1993, prior to the introduction of prescribed disease D12, Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema (PD D12).

This review considered the type of instrument to be used in relation to PD D12. The instruments at examination centres are not portable, and, as many of the potential customers were elderly and housebound, there was a need to provide the Medical Boards with protable equipment.

There was also a need to achieve consistency in recording, because the lung function result was an essential condition for the diagnosis question to be answered. This consistency is needed to cover use of the equipment in a variety of environmental conditions.

The machine used was chosen because it is easily portable, simple to use and can be calibrated easily by the operator; it gives a computerised result showing recorded and predicted figures for the customer; it also produces a printed hard copy of the results and records the date of calibration for retention.

The machines are regularly serviced, maintained and calibrated in accordance with the manufacturer's recommendations and they are replaced as soon as they become unserviceable. The airflow measurement system of the machine requires regular calibration to offset variations in volume due to ambient temperature changes. Re-calibration is carried out at the beginning of each examination session and after every ten tests when carried out at an examination centre. On visits to the customer's home the machines are re-calibrated each time before use.

Several other types of machine are in use in Medical Boarding Centres for respiratory diseases, although these are not used for PD D12. They are not programmed with Professor Cotes' figures of comparative lung function volumes which are the standard for PD D12 diagnosis. These machines are non-portable and hold calibration well. In accordance with the manufacturer's recommendations, adjustments are needed only every 6-12 months because they are static and less subject to ambient temperature variation.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Industrial Injuries Benefit

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the current definition of pneumoconiosis in the social security legislation to include chronic bronchitis and emphysema.

Mr. Scott: None. Chronic bronchitis and emphysema are separate diseases and could not be included within a definition of pneumoconiosis.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications were received from miners (a) over and (b) under 70 years of age for disablement assessment under the Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema Regulations; how many applications have been processed to date; and how many were successful.

Mr. Scott: The total number of claims received by 8 May 1994 was about 43,300. Up to the end of the first phase of the take-on (6 February), about 22,500 claims were from miners and ex-miners over 70; since that date, those over 70 have been included in the overall claims figures. Of about 31,400 claims processed to date, about 3,200 were assessed as 14 per cent. or more disabled. Figures are based on a 100 per cent. count and subject to amendment.

War Veterans

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many former members of the armed forces who served during the 1939-45 war are now in receipt of income support and other means-tested benefits.

Mr. Burt: The information is not available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Child Care Survey

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) of 17 May, Official Report, column 416, what was the cost of the child care survey; and what are the reasons for not publishing the results.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: As stated in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on 9 February at column 278, the fee paid to the consultants who conducted the childcare survey is a matter of commercial confidentiality. Given the Committee's decision to take no further action on this issue it considered the publication of the survey results to be inappropriate.

Satellite Television, Millbank

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will install a satellite dish on 7 Millbank to enable hon. Members to receive the live coverage of Parliament produced by Sky TV.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I have been asked to reply.

Any consideration of providing Members with the means to receive satellite television would be best undertaken once the House has considered the respective conclusions of the Information and Broadcasting Committees, on the introduction of the parliamentary data and video network and the "clean feed" of parliamentary proceedings.

Private Members' Bills

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Lord President of the Council (1) what was the average length of time taken by the Office of Parliamentary Counsel in responding to departmental requests for assistance with the drafting of (a) amendments or new clauses in relation to Government legislation and (b) Government-prompted amendments for onward transmission to Back Benchers for use in debate in relation to private Members' Bills in each of the last 12 months;

(2) if he will list for each month in 1994 the number of amendments or new clauses which were drafted by or with the assistance of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel categorised as (a) Government legislation, (b) Government amendments and so on in relation to private Members' Bills and (c) Government-assisted amendments or new clauses for supply to Back Benchers for use in debate in relation to private Members' Bills;

(3) how many requests the Office of Parliamentary Counsel has had from each Government Department in each quarter for the past two years for the drafting of amendments and in relation to (a) Government legislation and (b) private Members' Bills in which amendments or new clauses are for supply to Back Benchers for use in debate;

Mr. Newton: This information is not recorded.

Ministerial Salaries

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many members of the Government are currently in receipt of a ministerial salary, and what was the comparable figure in April 1979.

Mr. Newton: One hundred and eight members of the Government are currently in receipt of a ministerial salary. The comparable figure prior to the general election of 1979 was 107, and after the general election 106.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 311, what was the cost of the calls made on portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintainance costs.

Mr. Newton: In 1993-94 the cost of calls made on portable telephones was £204·70. The purchase and subscription costs were £2,038·04. There were no maintainance costs.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made as to whether the National Radiological Protection Board's study of nuclear test veterans who have developed posterior subcapsular eye cataracts will be undertaken in sufficient numbers to prevent a false negative result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Although we are following its progress, the study in question is not being carried out on behalf of my Department. We have therefore made no such assessment.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to paying compensation to nuclear test veterans as part of the recognition given to service men in the context of the commemorations of D-day and of the end of the second world war.

Mr. Hanley: Over the period between the nuclear tests and the end of 1990, the total incidence of death and malignant disease among British nuclear test veterans has been no higher than among either the general population or a matched control group. This was clearly shown in the report of the National Radiological Protection Board published last December, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. These facts do not sustain a case for compensation.

D-day

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), of 10 May 1994, Official Report, column 127, if he will provide a breakdown of the estimated expenditure by his Department on events commemorating the 50th anniversary this year of the D-day landings.

Mr. Hanley: The current estimates of additional costs break down as follows:

Portsmouth area events	800,000
Normandy area events	300,000
Public relations programme	200,000
Media facilities	1,500,000
Miscellaneous (including planning staff, education programme, VVIP/VIP transport and accommodation)	700,000
Total	3,500,000

Exercise First Crusade

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the participation by principal units in 1 Brigade's recent First Crusade exercise, enumerating those units absent on operational or other training commitments, and expressing their strength as a proportion of the brigade's strength.

Mr. Hanley: Those units under the operational command of 1 Mechanised Brigade which participated in Exercise First Crusade were 1 Royal Tank Regiment and 1 Royal Welch Fusiliers. Those units that were absent because of operational commitments were 1 Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters Regiment—who were serving in Northern Ireland—and 1 Duke of Wellington's Regiment—who were serving in Bosnia.

The following units also took part in the exercise:

a. 1 Royal Horse Artillery
b. 22 Regt Royal Engineers
c. A composite logistic unit
d. 7 Gurkha Regiment, Gurkha infantry battalion from 5 Airborne Brigade and a squadron from the Household Cavalry Regiment, all of whom acted as enemy forces.

Eurofighter 2000

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his counterpart in (a) Germany (b) Spain or (c) Italy to discuss progress on Eurofighter 2000; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence met the Italian Defence Minister, the State Secretary in the German Ministry of Defence and the Spanish national armaments director at the Eurofighter 2000 international debut at Warton, Lancashire on 4 May. They noted the major step forward in development which the commencement of the flight test phase represents, and the importance of the project both to our military capability and the European aerospace industry.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of Eurofighter's test flight; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The first Eurofighter 2000 development aircraft made a successful maiden flight on 27 March 1994 in Germany followed closely by the second development aircraft in the United Kingdom on 6 April 1994.

The initial reports from the test pilots were very positive and both aircraft met their full test objectives successfully.

Since then the two aircraft have made a total of 12 flights without any significant problems: the EF2000 flight test programme is now well under way and although flight test evaluation is still in its early stages, the initial results are very encouraging. I have every confidence that the aircraft will live up to all our expectations.

RAF Valley

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the possible impact of adverse weather on weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley.

Mr. Hanley: Irrespective of the base of operation, adverse weather sometimes affects range sorties and results in a failure to complete the planned exercise. However, these occurrences are kept to a minimum by the use of range controllers and weather check aircraft.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the possible impact of human error on the part of solo trainee pilots on weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley;

(2) where weapons will be loaded for weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley after the closure of RAF Chivenor;

(3) what assessment he has made of the possible impact of solo trainee pilots encountering unforeseen difficulties on average times spent on the weapons range in weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley, as compared to the existing pattern of sorties from RAF Chivenor.

Mr. Hanley: There is no intention to fly solo weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley. Should a decision be taken to close RAF Chivenor, aircraft from RAF Valley would load weapons at RAF St. Athan.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the possible impact of congested airways on weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley.

Mr. Hanley: The effect will be negligible as aircraft transiting between RAF Valley and RAF Chivenor—or RAF St. Athan—will not usually need to fly through civil airways.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the extra transit fuel costs of operating weapons range training sorties from RAF Valley instead of from RAF Chivenor.

Mr. Hanley: Because more efficient flight profiles can be used by aircraft flying to and from RAF Valley, the difference in fuel costs would be negligible.

Combat Aircraft

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the percentage reduction in Royal Air Force overall front line combat aircraft strength since 1990.

Mr. Hanley: Since 1990, the number of RAF front-line fast-jet combat aircraft—including those in operational conversion units—has reduced by about one third.

Civilian Personnel

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of civilian personnel employed by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Aitken: The total number of civilian personnel employed by my Department on 1 April 1994 was 143,700.

Nuclear Co-operation

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his French counterpart on future further nuclear co-operation.

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has regular meetings with Defence Minister Leotard at which they discuss a variety of issues, including nuclear co-operation when appropriate. I can confirm that exchanges with France on nuclear matters are progressing well.

RAF Manpower

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the percentage reduction in Royal Air Force uniformed manpower strength since 1990.

Mr. Hanley: Between 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1994, the Royal Air Force total strength—including trainees—fell by 15·6 per cent. from the April 1990 position.

HMS Endurance

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 188, what consideration he gave before October 1991 to the replacement of HMS Endurance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The 1991 annual structural survey of HMS Endurance unexpectedly revealed a risk of hull failure in Antarctic or very cold conditions. The decision was therefore taken in August of that year to decommission the vessel. It had originally been assumed that HMS Endurance would continue in service until at least the middle of the 1990s, and planning for her replacement had therefore not commenced when this decision was taken.

As the Government were committed to maintain the programme previously carried out by HMS Endurance, a market survey was undertaken to investigate which suitable ships might be available to undertake the ice patrol task in the 1991-92 season. This survey identified MV Polar Circle as the only suitable ship, and she was accordingly taken up by the Ministry of Defence on a short-term bare boat charter while the requirement for a longer term replacement was being considered.

Northern Iraq

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 May, Official Report, column 130, if he will take all possible steps to ensure that the families of those United Kingdom service personnel killed in Northern Iraq on 14 April are satisfied with the information his Department is able to provide them on the circumstances surrounding the incident.

Mr. Hanley: The United States investigation into the incident is not yet complete. Once completed, the results will be made available to the next of kin of the British service personnel as soon as possible. Both the United States and United Kingdom Governments are working closely to ensure that the families will receive as much information as possible.

Defence Costs Study

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 May, Official Report, column 188, whether the publication of the broad outcome of the Defence costs study will include detailed information on reductions in logistical support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: I hope to announce the broad outcome of the Defence costs study in July. Where it is possible to make public the detail of proposed changes to our logistic support services arising from the Defence costs study, as part of the announcement, I shall do so.

Royal Navy Hydrographic Service

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is in a position to report the outcome of the Government's review of the Royal Navy's hydrographic service.

Mr. Hanley: The Government attach importance to a specialist hydrographic capability to provide effective support to Royal Navy operations in peace and war. We have consequently decided to upgrade the capability of the hydrographic service by the purchase of four new hydrographic vessels, which will be commercially designed with an improved technical capability. The new ships, which will be larger than the existing vessels, will be either leased or owned by MOD, depending on which option offers best value for money. Her Majesty's survey launch Gleaner will remain in service for the foreseeable future. We believe that the resultant squadron of five survey vessels will best meet the requirements of Defence, including the ability to respond to unexpected short-notice tasking. All the vessels will be manned by Royal Navy crews and will fly the white Ensign.

Army Base Repair Organisation

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the key targets set for the chief executive of the Army Base Repair Organisation Agency for 1994-95.

Mr. Hanley: The chief executive of the Army Base Repair Organisation Agency—ABRO—has been set the following key targets for 1994-95.

1. To complete the repair programme to the plan as agreed on 1 April 1994.
2. Implement an automated, full cost accrual accounting system by 31 March 1995.
3. Within the overall total quality management (TQM) philosophy adopted by ABRO, to achieve ISO 9002 pre-assessment by 31 March 1995 in the HQ and all workshops.
4. To complete the market test of ABRO services in the eastern district by 31 March 1995. (Subject to review and revalidation following the outcome of the Defence costs study recommendations).
5. To reduce by 5 per cent. the 1993-94 ratio of labour costs to hours of production by 31 March 1995.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what practical measures Her Majesty's Government intend to take to combat Iranian terrorism; and how the Government will act in concert with partners in the European Union and the United Nations in measures to tackle this problem.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are very concerned about reports of Iranian involvement in terrorism and have regular contacts with our partners in the European Union about how best to tackle this issue. We and our European partners have promoted resolutions at the UN General Assembly and the UN Commission on Human Rights expressing our concern, while the latter resolution also urged the Government of Iran to refrain from activities against members of the Iranian opposition abroad and to co-operate wholeheartedly with the authorities of other countries in investigating and punishing offences reported by them.

European Parliament

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will take steps to prevent neo-fascists from taking their seats in the European Parliament.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: All members of the European Parliament are democratically elected and therefore fully entitled to take up their seats.

Upper Limb Disorder

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Goodlad: Three members of staff have initiated legal action against the FCO for alleged negligence in respect of upper limb disorders said by the claimants to be work-related.

Henderson Island

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to prevent damage by rats and tourists on Henderson island.

Mr. Goodlad: We are currently drawing up a management plan for Henderson island, in consultation with the Joint Nature Conservation committee, the governor of Pitcairn and the Pitcairn islanders, which will address the threats posed to Henderson's environment by rats and tourists. In the meantime, tourists visiting Henderson are obliged to comply with a number of regulations drawn up by the governor to minimise damage to the island's ecology.

Cyprus

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of which international organisations Cyprus is a member and of which either Greece or Turkey is not a member.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Cyprus is a member of the following organisations to which neither Greece nor Turkey belong:

The Commonwealth
The Non-Aligned Movement
The Group of 77.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the constitution of the Republic of Cyprus restricts Cyprus from joining any international organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We understand that the constitution of the Republic of Cyprus does not restrict it from joining any international organisation.

Italy

Mr. Denis MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussion the British ambassador in Rome has had with neo-fascist politicians in the Italian Government regarding common positions in advance of the EU 1996 Intergovernmental conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: None.

Palestine

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance Her Majesty's Government are providing bilaterally and through the EC to support the Palestinians in the light of the Gaza-Jericho agreement signed in Cairo on 4 May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The following is the information:

United Kingdom aid to Palestinians

The United Kingdom intends to provide £70 million bilaterally and multilaterally to the Palestinians over the next three years.

EC assistance

Much of our aid will go through the EC, which will provide 500 mecu during 1994-98, half in grants, half in EIB loans. Of the 50 mecu of grants for 1994, the United Kingdom was instrumental in stimulating a contribution of up to 10 mecu for the Palestinian police.

The EC is also providing assistance for the Palestinian elections.

Bilateral and other assistance

We are providing £6 million to UNWRA in 1994. In addition, the United Kingdom has put together a series of bilateral initiatives in areas where we have particualar expertise and which the Palestinians have identified as priorities. These include:

(i) Police Training

We are running two training courses for senior Palestinian police officers in June and July. We are considering offering further training in specialist areas such as riot control, forensic work and community policing.

We are providing 200 sets of riot control equipment.

(ii) Legal Assistance

We are providing expert legal help to the chairman of the Higher Palestinian Legal Committee.

(iii) Assistance with the Palestinian Elections

We are helping with preparation for the elections—in addition to the EC assistance. We will provide monitors for them when they take place.

(iv) Financial Sector

The UK held a very successful seminar on financial markets in the Middle East on 28 and 29 April.

The Bank of England is offering assistance on central banking matters—probably primarily training.

The UK has offered to provide consultancy services and other assistance to the commercial banking sector in the occupied territories.

We are undertaking a study of middle east stock markets.

(v) PECDAR

The UK is ready to provide assistance to the Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction—PECDAR.

(vi) Media Project

The UK is supporting the establishment of a Palestinian radio station.

(vii) Assistance to NGOs and Other Agencies

Under the ODA's special programme of assistance to the occupied territories, we are providing support for: a nurses training programme in Gaza; work of British NGOs including medical aid for the Palestinians and Save the Children; water resources management projects; and training in institution building, with the British Council.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Karel Van Miert

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met the European Commissioner Mr. Karel Van Miert; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade last met Mr. Van Miert on 11 May 1993. They discussed the direction of EC competition policy and the European merger regulation.

Company Investigations

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Brymore (Steels) Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost to the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(2) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Andromeda Electronics Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(3) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of H. and C. (4) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Elliot Group of Peterborough Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(5) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Helmville Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(6) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Alarmount Properties Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(7) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Brush Aggregates Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(8) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Metalman Engineering Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(9) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Reliance Plastering Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(10) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Intervester SA were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(11) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Phoenix Shipbuilders Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(12) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Wilson-Mandelberg Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when the will publish the final reports;

(13) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Portcarne Holdings Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports;

(14) when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Parsons, Sherwin and Company Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: All the inspectors were Departmental officers and the costs of their investigation are not available. Decisions not to publish their reports were all taken in 1979 or the early 1980s. The further information requested by the hon. Member is as follows:

Company	Date of appointment of inspectors	Date of report
Helmville Limited	25 July 1973	13 November 1979

[2] Final.

Patent Office

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to announce his policies on the future of the Patent Office.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government are considering the report by Price Waterhouse which was commissioned as part of the review of the Patent Office. An announcement will be made to Parliament once the review is complete.

Research and Development

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how he measures the success of investment decisions made by his Department through the research and development budget.

Mr. McLoughlin: All programmes supported by the Department's innovation budget are subject to regular monitoring and ex-post evaluation. Reports of completed evaluations are lodged in the Library of the House.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will list the schemes organised by his Department to provide public investment in research and development relevant to industry, the amount of money made available for each scheme in each of the last five years, its distribution between the private and public sectors and the percentage allocation in each standard planning region;

(2) how much money in each of the last five years has been allocated to the research and development of advanced composites; what organisations or companies have received financial support; and what percentage of funding went to academic research in each year;

(3) if he will list for each of the last five years the amount of money that was awarded to each company and organisation in each standard planning region of the United Kingdom for research and development, indicating the percentage awarded in each region;

(4) what percentage of his research and development budget is awarded to small companies.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information about my Department's schemes for supporting research and development is given in "Trade and Industry 1994" (Cm 2154) and in the "Forward Look of Government Funded Science, Engineering and Technology 1994", published by HMSO (ISBN 0 11 430098 4).

The additional detailed information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the criteria and procedures set out for applications for, and granting of, funding for research and development from schemes operated by his Department.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department's small firms merit award for research and technology—SMART—and support for products under research—SPUR—support research and development by individual smaller companies. The LINK and EUREKA schemes support collaborative research. Eligibility criteria and procedures are given in the scheme literature.

Timber

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will set up a register of United Kingdom-based companies, and their size, by turnover and employment, which are principally or partially involved in timber exploitation in the areas of tropical rainforests.

Mr. McLoughlin: No, I see no useful purpose for such a register.

Trade Associations

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress he has made in his policy in respect of harmonising trade associations and the sponsorship of their industries by his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: We wish to see trade associations that are powerful, effective and influential in representing their members and which play a significant role in promoting the international competitiveness of their sectors. The Department has therefore worked closely, and will continue to work closely, with many trade associations with these aims in mind and to ensure that there is an effective and representative trade association for each sector of industry and commerce.

Sustech Programme

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has received from the European Chemical Industry Council, CEFIC, on its programme, Sustech-1; and what support is being given by the European Commission's industry directorate and research directorate to the Sustech programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have had no contact with CEFIC or the European Commission on the Sustech proposal, although officials have been appraised of the proposal by one company closely involved in it. I understand that development of the proposal is still at an early stage.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many companies by region, employing (a) fewer than 100, (b) between 100 and 250 and (c) more than 250 persons have been awarded (i) regional selective assistance and (ii) regional enterprise grants since the new assisted areas map was announced in 1993.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 23 May 1994]: The number of companies that have been offered (i) regional selective assistance and (ii) regional enterprise grants in England from the introduction of the new assisted area map on 1 August 1993 to 17 May 1994, are as follows. All the offers of regional enterprise grant were made to companies employing fewer than 100 persons.

HEALTH

Health Service Staff

7. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent guidelines she has issued in respect of senior NHS staff meeting shadow spokesmen.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Ambulance Service

16. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are her future plans for the ambulance service.

Mr. Sackville: National health service ambulance services are to be commended on the considerable advances they have made in recent years.

The Government will ensure that services maintain the excellent progress made towards meeting national standards for response times and towards the target of having a paramedic on each front-line ambulance.

Patients Charter

17. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made under the patients charter on outpatient waiting times; and how she proposes to strengthen the charter in this area.

Dr. Mawhinney: We are committed to reducing all waiting times. Since 1 April 1992 the patients charter has required health authorities to set and publish local charter standards for waiting time for first out-patient appointments for each hospital, specialty and consultant. On 13 April 1994 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that a national target will be set for the length of time patients have to wait for their first out-patient appointment. Further details will be announced later this year.

Organ Donation

18. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the individual's choice as to donation of organs.

Mr. Sackville: The wishes of the individual are paramount when considering the question of organ donation. This is secured by the Human Tissue Act 1961 under which organs from a deceased person may be used for therapeutic, educational or research purposes if that is known to have been the wish of the deceased or, if his wishes are not known, those of his relatives.

Access to Hospital

19. Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she last met members of the medical profession to discuss access to hospital for their patients.

Mr. Sackville: We have regular meetings with representatives of the medical profession during which a wide range of issues are discussed.

Geriatric Beds

20. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current total number of geriatric beds in English hospitals; and what the figure was three years ago.

Mr. Bowis: In 1992-93, the latest year for which figures are available, the total number of national health service beds in England specifically designated for elderly people was 59,562. In 1989-90 the figure was 73,046.

In the same period the number of elderly people treated rose from 449,000 to 529,000, reflecting more effective treatments and use of hospital beds. In addition improvements in rehabilitation and community services are enabling more people to receive care at home, including things like hospital at home initiatives.

Junior Doctors

21. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been achieved in reducing the hours worked by junior doctors in the south Thames region.

Dr. Mawhinney: Between September 1990 and March 1994 the number of posts contracted for more than an average of 83 hours a week in south Thames fell from 1,963 to nine. In the year to 31 March 1994, the number of hard-pressed on-call posts contracted on average for more than 72 hours a week fell from 1,404 to 879. Our priority this year is to eliminate these remaining hard-pressed posts.

25. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been achieved in reducing the hours worked by junior doctors in the Anglia and Oxford region.

Dr. Mawhinney: In September 1990 there were 1,225 posts contracted to work for more than 83 hours a week in Anglia and Oxford. All these posts have now been eliminated. In the year to 31 March 1994, the number of hard-pressed on-call posts contracted on average for more than 72 hours a week fell from 1,051 to 518, a reduction of 51 per cent. Our priority this year is to eliminate these remaining hard-pressed posts.

Traffic Pollution

22. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what strategy she is adopting to combat the bad health effects of traffic pollution especially in relation to carcinogens; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: We will continue to work to identify any adverse health effects that may arise from traffic pollution and to mitigate those effects.

National Health Service Trusts

23. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of hospital and community health services in Suffolk is now carried out by national health service trusts.

Mr. Sackville: Suffolk is an excellent example of the success of the trust movement. Within the Anglia/Oxford region, all provider units are now trusts.

Dentistry

24. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the dentistry provision in Leeds.

Dr. Mawhinney: We are committed to an effective and accessible national health service dental service in Leeds.

The latest available figures indicate that both the number of dentists and the number of patients registered in Leeds has risen throughout the past year.

Royal Free Hospital

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many individuals over pensionable age are being treated at the Royal Free hospital.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write the Baroness Gardner of Parkes, chairman of the Royal Free Hampstead national health service trust for details.

Help Us to Help You

27. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Help Us to Help You campaign.

Dr. Mawhinney: I announced on 19 May, jointly with the medical profession, an extension of the Help Us to Help You campaign to encourage the appropriate use of general practitioner out-of-hours services.

Hip Replacements

28. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her latest estimate of the number of hip replacements carried out by the NHS; and how many were carried out in 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The latest available information is shown in the table.

	[1]1979	[2]1990-91
Hip replacement operations	23,410	50,725

Hospital Performances

29. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to publish comparative tables of hospital performance.

Dr. Mawhinney: The national health service performance tables will be published towards the end of June.

Limb Defects

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will initiate an inquiry into the incidence and geographical location of births involving the absence of limbs.

Mr. Sackville: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys conducted an inquiry into the prevalence of these malformations in coastal and inland areas. It concluded that there was no difference in prevalence.

NHS Budget

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the NHS budget and projected budget for London and England in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93, (c) 1993-94 and (d) 1994-95.

Mr. Sackville: Figures for London and England are not available on a comparable basis.

Out-patients

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the latest figures for the number of people on the waiting list for out-patients.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are no waiting lists for out-patient appointments.

NHS Audits

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure on audits in the national health service in each of the last three years; and what breakdown of that expenditure is available.

Mr. Sackville: Total expenditure for the external audits recorded in the individual accounts of national health service bodies was approximately:

	£ million
1991-92	18·3
1992-93	30·1

Notes

1. These figures may significantly overstate the true increase between the two financial years because of variations in the accounting treatment of audit services.
2. A meaningful national total cannot be derived for 1990-91.
3. The totals quoted do not include external audit expenditure for Special Trustees, the Special Hospitals Service Authority, or the Mental Health Act Commission.
4. Figures for the Prescription Pricing Authority were not separately identifiable in 1991-92.

Child Suicides

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children have committed suicide in each of the last 10 years by using paracetamol.

Mr. Bowis: The information is shown in the table.

Hospitals (Paper Towels)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the use of paper towels in hospitals and clinics in preference to hot air driers.

Mr. Sackville: None. It is for the managers of hospitals and clinics to decide upon the appropriate methods of hand drying to be used within the varying departments of the unit.

Mental Health

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the conclusions of the consultation on proposals to address section 18(4) of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Bowis: Shortly.

Infertility Treatment

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list those hospitals which have contracts with purchasers to provide infertility treatments, giving their average and lengthiest waiting times for first appointment and commencement of treatment for (a) those on the hospital's own list, (b) those who are accepted for treatment unde a contractual agreement with a fundholding general practitioner and (c) those who are accepted under a contractual arrangement with a health authority outside its own area.

Mr. Sackville: There is no central list of contracts agreed between purhasing authorities and hospitals. It is the responsibility of purchasing authorities to monitor the waiting times for treatment under the contracts they have agreed with hospitals inside or outside of the authority's area. Infertility treatment is not included on the list of procedures which a fundholding practice can purchase.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the average waiting times for infertility treatment to begin at each hospital providing this service, in each year since services began.

Mr. Sackville: Such information as is available is given in "Hospital Episode Statistics, Volume 2", copies of which are available in the Library.

Breast Unit, Guy's Hospital

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to ensure the continuation of the work of the breast unit at Guy's hospital.

Dr. Mawhinney: Guy's and St. Thomas's hospital trust and the London implementation group have jointly indicated their intention to retain breast cancer services, and the associated research programme, within the trust.

There will be a full public consultation on any proposed changes to hospital services in south east London in due course.

Doctor-nurse Teams

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people there are to each doctor-nurse team in (a) South Yorkshire and (b) nationally.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Alcohol-related Disease

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what current information her Department maintains on occupations vulnerable to alcohol-related disease.

Mr. Bowis: All occupations are vulnerable.

Drug Misuse

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment she has made of the dangers to health of the use of gamma hydroxybutyrate;

(2) what assessment she has made of the dangers to health of the use of the drugs (a) ketamine hydrochloride and (b) khat;

(3) what assessment she has made of the dangers to health of the use of (a) amyl nitrate and (b) butyl nitrate.

Mr. Bowis: The Department continues to monitor the extent to which drugs are misused and the changing patterns of misuse. As with any drug that is misused, the Department warns the public of the risks to health.

Crohn's Disease

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the benefits of cannabis use for sufferers of Crohn's disease.

Mr. Sackville: None.

NHS (Private Capital)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 706, if she will provide details of the value of private sector capital for each of the nine schemes listed using private capital approved up to the end of February 1993 and the private sector companies involved.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 19 May 1994]: The information is shown in the table.

Nursing Students

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nursing students took up places in each region in England in each year since 1990; and if she will make a statement on the likely level for 1994-95 assuming both volume and percentage changes.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The available information is shown in the table.

Final figures for 1993-94 and 1994-95 are not yet available.

Resource Allocation

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when she intends to publish the report of consultants from York university on resource allocation; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what was the extent of the shortfall in the funding of London's health services identified by the King's Fund Research Institute in its report "London, The Key Facts"; and what steps she has planned to reduce that shortfall;

(3) what assessment she has made of the conclusion of the King's Fund Research Institute in its report "London, The Key Facts", on the extent of the underfunding of London's health service and the conclusions of the resource allocation review conducted for the Department of Health.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 23 May 1994]: We have received the report of the review of weighted capitation which builds on the analytical work undertaken by consultants from York university. The review is a major piece of work and will require consideration.

The King's fund report entitled "London, The Key facts" has confirmed the view that London's primary and community care services are underdeveloped compared with the rest of the country. An extra £85 million is being invested this year to improve primary and community care services in the capital.

The King's Fund Institute also claimed that London's health services are underfunded by £200 million, but did not give any detailed reasoning for this conclusion.

Abortions

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women from (a) Jersey, (b) Guernsey and (c) other Channel islands have had legal abortions in England in each year from 1968 to 1992; and at what gestational age.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 23 May 1994]: The information requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the total number of legal abortions for residents of the Channel islands performed in England and Wales in 1992 was 370; of these, the gestation period was under nine weeks for 119, nine to 12 weeks for 207, 13 to 19 weeks for 38 and 20 weeks and over for six. Information for 1970 to 1991 inclusive is shown in the table, but only grouped as Channel islands, or from 1970 to 1985 Channel islands and the Isle of Man. A breakdown of these figures by age-group for 1974 onwards is given in part (i) of table 25 in the annual reference volume "Abortion Statistics" series AB1 nos. 1 to 18; copies of which are available in the Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will review the conditions of eligibility for compensation under the Pneumoconiosis, etc. (Workers' Compensation) Act 1979 following the acceptance by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council of industrial causes of chronic bronchitis and emphysema in order to include sufferers from chronic bronchitis and emphysema, who had previously worked at industries recognised as causing industrial lung diseases and who hitherto have been excluded from compensation under the Act.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so.

Radiation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many deaths have been recorded in each year since 1979 arising from the over-exposure to radiation doses from X-ray equipment used to examine industrial welds and other industrial uses.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Neither the national mortality statistics nor the Health and Safety Executive's database of fatal accidents show any deaths from acute overexposure to any type of radiation in the period 1979 up to April 1992—latest available information.

However figures from the Department of Social Security show that between 1983 and 1988 there were five awards of industrial death benefit for the prescribed diseases due to electro-magnetic radiations, other than radiant heat, or to ionising particles. It is not possible to say whether these individuals were industrial radiographers, or other exposed workers. Nor is it possible to determine when these individuals were exposed.

WALES

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each training and enterprise council in each of the last three years and endorsements for training purposes categorised, A, B and C.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment on 16 May at column 363.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the level of expenditure on (a) primary education and (b) secondary education in (i) money terms and (ii) real terms in each of the past five years in each local education authority in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The available information is given in the following tables. Information on individual education authorities is not available on a comparable basis for 1989-90. It is not possible to disaggregate pre-primary and primary expenditure. Figures on capital expenditure for 1993-94 are not yet available.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his assessment of the number of lorries diverted from the Severn bridge in a westerly direction through Gwent roads since each of the last two increases in tolls on the Severn bridge.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There have been increases in the numbers of heavy goods vehicles entering Gwent from England over the last two years, but I cannot say that all are due to the effects of tolling. From the limited data available, it is estimated that the increases in daily flows are:

200 on the A48 in Chepstow
150 on the A40 in Monmouth
320 on the A4136 at Monmouth

In March 1994 the Highways Agency commissioned traffic surveys to establish the true extent of the problem. The report of the survey is not expected until mid June.

Employment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the latest estimate of the proportion of men between the ages of 60 and 65 years in Wales who are gainfully occupied.

Mr. Redwood: According to the autumn 1993 labour force survey there were 25,000 men in Wales aged 60 to 64 who were in employment, representing 35 per cent. of all males aged 60 to 64. The figure includes all men who were doing some paid work in the referene week, those who had a job that they were temporarily away from and those doing unpaid family work for a business that they or a relative owned.

Head Teachers (Dismissal)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in what circumstances he will dismiss head teachers; and what will be the process involved.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend and I expect the governing bodies of all schools to keep under review the performance of the headteacher and consider what action might be appropriate when the school is underperforming. When a school is identified in a report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools or a registered inspector as failing to provide acceptable standards of education, and my right hon. Friend is not satisfied with the action the school proposes to take to address the shortcomings, he has the power to establish an education association to take over the running of the school. We would expect any education association to look at the position of the headteacher and other staff in considering its plan of action. My right hon. Friend has the power to require the association to do so.

The circumstances in which headteachers can be fairly dismissed are the same as those for other employees. There can be no hard and fast rules about what action should be taken in respect of the headteacher: each case would have to be considered on its merits. Any dismissal would have to be in accordance with the procedures and requirements set out in the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on which date notice was given to each NHS trust in Wales of their funding for the financial year 1994-95; what plans he has regarding the timing of notice to trusts in regard to pay awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's announcement of 16 March, which sets out the external financing limits for NHS trusts in 1994-95 together with the allocations to health authorities and family health services authorities. The external financing limits, however, relate only to new borrowing or the use of reserves by NHS trusts. Their general funding is determined via the contractual negotiations with the various health authorities and GP fundholders which they serve.

The Government's acceptance of the recommendations of the pay review bodies was conveyed to health authorities and NHS trusts in February with notification of the increases payable to relevant staff groups from 1 April followed in March. The notification of pay awards for other staff groups entitled to Whitley council terms and conditions of service is totally dependent upon the conclusion of 1994-95 pay negotiations within each of the functional councils. The amount and timing of pay awards to staff employed on local terms and conditions is a matter for each individual NHS trust.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many incidents were reported of (a) thefts and (b) poisonings or shootings of buzzards, kestrels and sparrowhawks in each year since 1989.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information on thefts of birds or their eggs is not held by the Department.

Details of confirmed poisoning incidents in Wales are as follows:

Species	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993
Buzzard	10	1	1	1	4

The only confirmed shootings of any of these species during the period were those of two buzzards in 1992.

Health Service Funding

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) of 16 March, Official Report, column 698, if he will explain on what figure he bases his claim that the £1,295 million available for current spending on health authorities is a 4·3 per cent. increase on 1993-94 plans, and where that figure appears in the Welsh Office's published expenditure plans 1994-95 to 1996-97 (Cm 2515).

Mr. Redwood: The £1,295 million which I announced on 16 March as available for hospital and community health services current spending in 1994-95 represents a cash increase of 4·3 per cent. over the £1,242 million planned spend on comparable services in 1993-94. These amounts are encompassed in the provision shown in figure 9.01 of Cm 2515 as planned expenditure in 1993-94 and 1994-95 for current spending on hospital and community health services and—in anticipation of the transfer of funding from health authorities to GP fundholders for their spending on hospital and community health services—within the current expenditure provision for family health services.

1994 GCSE Examinations

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Joint Education Committee in relation to irregularities in the conduct of the 1994 GCSE examinations and access given to the candidates to the examination papers before time; if the school was in the state sector; what guidelines he has issued with respect to disciplinary proceedings in relation to the teacher concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: None. The school was in the state sector. The WJEC has investigated this matter thoroughly and is satisfied that a change to the current instructions about the security of examination papers which it issues to all examination centres, is not required.

The matter of disciplinary proceedings in relation to an individual teacher, is primarily a matter for the school concerned.

Dearing Report

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the (a) estimated and (b) out-turn cost of printing and delivering copies of the Dearing report, "The Review of School Curriculum and Assessment" to all schools.

Mr. Redwood: Copies of the Dearing report were issued to schools in Wales together with copies of the final report of the Curriculum Council for Wales. The final cost of printing and distribution of these reports was £42,108.

Cross-border Tendering

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his proposed consultation on cross-border tendering will take place; what will be its format; whom he proposes to consult; if he will make the consultation results public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My officials have written to the Council of Welsh Districts and Assembly of Welsh Counties inviting them to submit written comments preferably by Tuesday 7 June. I will place copies of any responses received in the Library of the House. I propose to announce the conclusions I have reached during report stage of the Local Government (Wales) Bill.

Canton Area Traffic Management Scheme

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from (a) the South Glamorgan county councils and (b) others in relation to the funding of the Canton area traffic management scheme; what decisions he has made and announced in relation to grant aid for the scheme or further studies in relation to it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: South Glamorgan county council submitted a proposal for a £1·5 million scheme last year and the hon. Member wrote in support. Under current arrangements for transport grant the Department can support only schemes costing over £5 million. Funding for smaller schemes has to be found from the unhypothecated annual settlements for capital and revenue spending. It is possible that elements would be eligible for strategic development scheme assistance. The council was advised of our conclusion on 12 January.

TRANSPORT

Noise Regulations

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish the draft noise regulations for new railway lines.

Mr. Freeman: Comments on the draft already issued for public consultation are currently being considered. Our aim is to present draft regulations to Parliament during the summer.

Transport Research Laboratory

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of proposals for the Transport Research Laboratory to be allowed to undertake commercially-funded research.

Mr. Key: The Transport Research Laboratory already undertakes commercially-funded research. The Government's assessment is that the laboratory will be much better placed to compete for commercially-funded work when it is in the private sector.

M25

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what representations he has received from members of the public in Coventry regarding the effect on the environment of proposals to widen the M25; and what proposals he has for minimising the effects these proposals will have on the environment;

(2) how the sites of special scientific interest affected by the proposed widening of the M25 will be protected; what representations he has received about these proposals; if he will list them; and what consultations he has carried out with members of the public or organisations.

Mr. Key: These questions relate to operational matters of the Highways Agency. I have asked the chief executive, Mr. Lawrie Haynes to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 23 May 1994:

The Minister for Roads and Traffic, Mr. Key, has asked me to write to you in reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about widening the M25 motorway.

I am sorry, but information about representations received from particular locations is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Similarly, many thousands of representations have been received about the widening proposals and I am afraid it would not be practicable to list them as you requested.

About 70 per cent. of the proposed M25 widening will be undetaken within existing highway boundaries to limit the effects on surrounding areas. Where environmental effects cannot be avoided, a range of measures are proposed to keep them to a minimum. Depending on the particular location, the measures include the provision of noise and visual screens, landscaping, noise insulation to properties and, where appropriate, the use of porous asphalt to reduce traffic noise.

It is not currently expected that any land will be required from Sites of Special Scientific Interest (SSSIs) except possibly for a small area which may be needed from Ockham and Wisley Commons SSSI which surrounds Junction 10.

We have consulted the public and a wide range of organisations, including English Nature, Countryside Commission and National Rivers Authority, on all M25 widening proposals published to date. Environmental statements have been published for comment on each of these proposals (except for proposed link roads between junctions 15-16 which is at an earlier stage of development and where an Assessment Report was published) and public exhibitions held in each case.

Roads (Land Acquisition)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the impact of the review of the road programme upon land acquisition costs over the next five years; and to what extent he expects the review to lead to the disposal of any land.

Mr. Key: As the information requested relates to operational matters of the Highways Agency I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. John Marshall, dated 19 May 1994.

I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the impact of the review of the road programme upon land acquisition costs and the extent to which it will lead to the disposal of any land.

The decision to withdraw schemes from the road programme, announced by the Secretary of State on 30 March, will result in a reduced spend on land acquisition over the next 5 years. It is not possible to give precise figures since the amount of land required for those schemes has, in many cases, not been determined and acquisition costs are subject to general fluctuations in the property market.

Where land has already been purchased for those schemes —for example under blight powers—it will be disposed of at the earliest opportunity consistent with sound management and disposal practice and Government Accounting requirements.

Seat Belts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which countries in the European Union require the fitting of seat belts in minibuses and coaches.

Mr. Key: None.

Bridges (Lorry Strikes)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken to prevent lorries from striking rail bridges.

Mr. Key: We work closely with Railtrack and other bridge owners, local authorities, bus operators and the haulage industry to monitor and reduce bridge strikes. Local authorities have been given guidance on the use of traffic signs to warn drivers of high vehicles in good time; and at 21 low bridges of particular concern we have installed automatic signs which are switched on by detectors of vehicles that are too high.

Piggyback Rail Corridor

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are his plans to respond to the report of the Piggyback consortium and the proposals from Central Railways to provide a piggy back rail corridor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I congratulate the Piggyback consortium on its report and would like to see the initiative taken forward to the next stage. To this end, the Government will be prepared to support the consortium's bids for European funds, subject to eligibility and competing pressure on available funds.

The central Railway group's proposal is an entirely private sector venture that would need in due course to obtain statutory authorisation by means of the procedures established in the Transport and Works Act. It would, therefore, be inappropriate for me to comment at this stage.

Four-wheel Drive Vehicles

Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what research his Department has conducted into the change in the numbers of safari-type four-wheel drive vehicles;

(2) what research his Department has conducted into the impact on pedestrian safety of the level of ownership of safari-type vehicles.

Mr. Key: Market trends and predictions from the motor industry suggest that the market share for four-wheel-drive vehicles typified by the Land/Range Rover is rising rapidly and may reach 3 per cent. of the car population by 1996.

The Department has not carried out any research in terms of the level of ownership of safari type vehicles. But Transport Research Laboratory tests on such vehicles fitted with bull bars showed that the rigidity of the metal bars could cause an increase in pedestrian injuries. We have now taken steps to identify accidents involving a vehicle with bull bars and a pedestrian to ascertain whether bull bars are causing increased injuries. We do not expect to see results from this exercise before the end of 1994.

Cars (Safe Manufacture)

Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has conducted into the safe manufacture of cars in respect of the severity of the effect on pedestrians of accidental impact.

Mr. Key: For nearly 20 years the Transport Research Laboratory has been studying pedestrian safety and the mechanism of injury when struck by a car. The United Kingdom has led the European research institutes in the preparation of a draft directive. We are now awaiting a proposal for a directive from the EC Commission. Independent research carried out in the United Kingdom, supported by similar research in Germany, suggested that if all cars were softened to meet the proposals 7 per cent. of fatalities and 21 per cent. of serious injuries due to impacts by cars would be avoided. This might save approaching 100 lives per annum in the United Kingdom.

M5

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were his reasons for approving the J17 link road from the M5 to Weston-Super-Mare town centre.

Mr. Key: Various stages of the Weston-super-Mare primary distributor road between the M5—junction 21— and the town centre have been supported with transport supplementary grant. This scheme meets the criteria for acceptance of expenditure on TSG, being an improvement to the primary route network which relieves a residential area from the effects of through traffic. It was given a high priority by Avon county council, the local highway authority responsible for all aspects of its planning and design.

New Road Schemes

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he or any members of his Department have received from persons or organisations concerned with the strategic importance of proposed new road schemes.

Mr. Key [holding answer 20 May 1994]: My right hon. Friend receives many representations from individuals and organisations about all aspects of proposed new road schemes, including questions of strategic importance.

Information about specific schemes in the road programme is available from the chief executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes.

Family Railcards

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table showing for each of the past five years, and as a total over the same period, the total amount spent on saver and supersaver tickets by rail passengers using family railcards, broken down into discounted adult fares and discounted child fares, together with the level of discount on saver and supersaver tickets for each year afforded to rail passengers using family railcards.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 20 May 1994]: This is a commercial matter for British Rail, but I understand that the information requested is as follows:

	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	1993-94
Saver and Supersaver discounted adult spend	N/A	N/A	N/A	£17·825 million	£18·706 million
Saver and Supersaver discounted child spend	N/A	N/A	N/A	£0·997 million	£0·956 million
Saver and Supersaver Total adult and child	N/A	N/A	£17·231 million	£18·822 million	£19·622 million
Adult Saver discount	34 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.
Adult Supersaver discount	34 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	25 per cent.
Child discount	£1 flat rate	£1 flat rate	£1 flat rate	£1 flat rate	£1 flat rate

N/A = Not available—These figures are not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

EDUCATION

Teachers, Kent

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many teaching staff and non-teaching staff were employed by the Kent local education authority for each year since 1988.

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on the number of employees of each local education authority is compiled by the local government management board from data collected on behalf of the joint staffing watch. The table shows the data available for the Kent local authority.

	Teachers and lecturers		Education Other
March	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time
1990	12,496	5,006	3,999	9,653
1991	12,087	4,176	3,655	7,854
1992	11,504	5,379	3,657	9,064
1993	10,857	5,592	3,546	9,692
1994	8,708	4,189	2,706	9,970

1. The table covers all staff in the LEA maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools sector, special and further education, and central administration. Staff employed by self-governing—GM—schools are not included. The 1994 figures exclude colleges which transferred to the new FE sector in April 1993.

2. "Education—Other" includes educational support, clerical, school meals and premises related staff employed in schools and colleges, together with central services and administration within the education service.

Dearing Report

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the (a) estimated and (b) out-turn cost of printing and delivering copies of the Dearing report on the review of school curriculum and assessment to all schools.

Mr. Robin Squire: The out-turn printing and distribution costs of Sir Ron Dearing's final report on the national curriculum published in January 1994 were £460,000; the bulk of this expenditure was in respect of copies of the report sent to schools but a precise breakdown is not available.

In line with Sir Ron Dearing's recommendations, proposals were published earlier this month for a slimmed down national curriculum in all subjects. The estimated cost of printing and distributing 120,000 sets of these consultation documents is about £700,000. About two-thirds have been sent to schools.

Student Statistics

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many mature students attended universities and colleges in each of the last three years.

Mr. Boswell: The table shows the number of students on their first year of an higher education course in Great Britain who were defined as mature[1] in each of the last three academic years.

1990-91	1991-92	1992-93
262,249	308,147	352,258

[1] Mature students are defined as those who at the start of their undergraduate course are aged 21 and over, and for those commencing a postgraduate course 25 years old and over.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many mature students currently in higher education are aged over 30 years.

Mr. Boswell: In the academic year 1992-93, there were 163,446 students aged over 30 years in their first year of study, of whom 154,219 were United Kingdom domiciled.

Educational Psychologists

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is his estimate of the increase in numbers of educational psychologists needed to fulfil the additional requirements set by the Education Act 1993 and the code of practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs.

Mr. Forth: Local education authorities should be able to meet the requirements of the 1993 Act and the code of practice within existing resources: the number of educational psychologists has increased by over 30 per cent. in the last 10 years. It is for each LEA to determine staffing levels based on local needs and priorities.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many educational psychologists have (a) entered and (b) left the profession during the past three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Forth: This information is not held centrally.

Schools Research

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list those research projects into (a) local management of schools and (b) grant-maintained status which have been supported by public funds, stating, in each case, the cost of support and the names of the applicants and their institutions.

Mr. Robin Squire: The following projects have been supported by the Department for Education:

Subject	Researcher	DFE grant £
Financial Delegation to Schools	Coopers and Lybrand Associates	68,277
Local Management of Schools—Guidance Manual and Training Programme	Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy (CIPFA)	135,000
LMS: Extension to Special Schools: Feasibility Study	Touche Ross Management Consultants	40,000
Review of LMS Initiative—Formula Funding Study	CIPFA	25,000
Advice to Schools on Service Contracts: LMS	Coopers and Lybrand Associates	54,500
LMS: Advice for Small Schools	Coopers and Lybrand Associates	55,999
Effectiveness of Schooling and Educational Resource Management	University of Birmingham (Professor H. Thomas)	45,927

The following projects have been supported by the Economic and Social Research Council:

Subject	Researcher	ESRC Grant £
LMS and Provision for Special Educational Needs	University of London Institute of Education (Ms J. M. Evans; Ms I. Lunt; Dr. P. E. Young)	73,537
Parental and Institutional Choice: Effects of More Open Enrolment and LMS	Open University (Professor R. Glatter; Dr. A. Hibbert)	35,910
Industrial Relations and the Local Management of Schools	Keele University (Dr. R. Seifert; Mr. M. Ironside)	43,150
LMS and School Culture: The Perceptions of Teachers, Heads and Chairs of Governors	Sheffield University (Mr. D. Shearn; Dr. R. Laughlin; Mrs. P. Broadbent)	9,970
The Effects of the Education Reform Act's Formula Funding on Resource Setting	Open University (Ms R. Levacic)	32.400
Opting for Grant-Maintained Status: A Study of Policy Making in Education	University of West of England (Dr. J. Fitz; Dr. D. Halpin)	53,071

School Budgets

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list those local education authorities whose local management schemes contain provision for schools to carry forward budget deficits from year to year.

Mr. Robin Squire: All local education authorities are required to include provision in their local management of schools schemes for the recovery of deficits incurred by individual schools at the end of the financial year. This will normally be from the following year's budget share, except where clear practical considerations preclude recovery on this timescale.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

South Africa

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to introduce a know-how fund for South Africa.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 4 May the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs announced that we expect to provide £100 million of British assistance over the next three years. This includes £60 million of bilateral aid which will provide know-how and support to the Government of National Unity and assistance to initiatives arising from the non-government sector.

Palestine

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid (a) was given through Britain's bilateral aid programme to Palestine in each year between 1990 and 1993 and (b) will be given in

(i) 1993-94, (ii) 1994–95 and (iii) 1996-97; and in each year, how much of this aid was or will be spent (1) in the form of direct grants to local Palestinian organisations, and (2) on the provision of consultation services and technical assistance by British organisations.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Our bilateral aid flows to the occupied territories from 1990-91 to 1992-93 were as follows:

Year	£ million
1990-91	1·1
1991-92	1·5
1992-93	1·5

Apart from the British Council-managed training programme—£0·2 million in 1990-91, £0·3 million in 1991-92 and £0·4 million in 1992-93—most of the funds were disbursed through British non-government organisations—NGOs—in many cases working with local Palestinian NGO partners.

In addition we have been making an annual contribution of £6 million to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency—UNRWA—which is responsible for Palestinian refugees.

In 1993-94 we spent about £2·9 million which includes a contribution of £1·3 million to the technical assistance trust fund set up by the World bank following the signature of the Israeli/Palestinian declaration of principles.

Over the next three years our assistance to the Palestinians will be primarily through our contributions to EC aid and UNRWA. Our bilateral aid will continue to include assistance through NGOs, as well as direct help to Palestinian institutions. The exact proportions of each type of aid are not determined in advance. We aim to respond flexibly to Palestinian needs.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Blue Ear Disease

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is being taken by Her Majesty's Government to counter blue ear disease in pigs.

Mr. Soames: The Blue Eared Pig Disease Order 1991 was revoked in November 1992, in line with an EC decision which made it clear that official control measures had become inappropriate and unnecessary. The disease was considered by veterinary experts to be of less economic significance than was orginally thought and had become milder in its effects. The United Kingdom pig industry was subsequently provided with advice which included recommended disease control measures and guidance on steps to take to deal with an outbreak. I am arranging for copies of the advice note prepared for farmers to be left in the House of Commons Library.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will estimate how long she expects the residuary milk marketing board to continue in existence.

Mr. Jack: A residuary milk marketing board will come into existence only if an approved reorganisation scheme is implemented. My right hon. Friends, the Secretary of State for Wales and the Minister, have yet to reach a decision on whether to grant the milk marketing board's application for approval. If a residuary MMB were to take over it might need to remain in existence for six years or more, given the legal possibility which exists for product liability claims to be brought in that period.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will bring forward proposals providing for milk producers to have majority representation on (a) the residuary milk marketing board, (b) the milk development council and (c) Genus.

Mr. Jack: The milk marketing board has proposed in its reorganisation scheme that the board of a residuary MMB should have majority producer representation. I cannot comment on individual aspects of the MMB's proposals in advance of a formal decision on whether to grant the board's application for approval but we have said that we believe producers should be strongly represented on any residuary board. If the MMB's proposals were implemented Genus would become Genus Ltd, an independent company. The constitution proposed by the MMB does not make special provision for producer representation on the board.

No decision has been taken to establish a milk development council. We are awaiting the result of the recent poll of producers.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make it her policy to promote a free market in milk supply rather than establish an arbitration mechanism.

Mr. Jack: My right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales are considering, in accordance with the provisions of the Agriculture Act 1993, whether to grant the milk marketing board's application for approval of its reorganisation scheme. The question whether or not approval should be granted does not pose itself in the terms suggested.

Milk Marque

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she will bring forward proposals to enable the operations of Milk Marque to begin officially.

Mr. Jack: It is not for my right hon. Friend the Minister to bring forward proposals but rather to consider, together with the Secretary of State for Wales, whether to grant the milk marketing board's application for approval of its reorganisation scheme. They will announce a decision as soon as they are in a position to do so.

Fishing Nets

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to her answer of 12 May, Official Report, columns 201-2, what instructions have been given to inspection officers as to the conditions which must be satisfied for a net to be acceptable in which the square mesh panel is fitted forward of the flapper.

Mr. Jack: The statutory instruments to which I referred in my reply of 12 May at column 201-02 and to which my hon. Friend the Palriamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Scottish Office referred in his reply of 17 May at column 410 set out the requirements for the use of square mesh panels. Inspecting officers are instructed to enforce these SIs as part of their fisheries enforcement work.

Article 4(i)(c) of Statutory Instrument 1992 No. 1344 requires square mesh panels to be sited in the codend, or in any extension piece or immediately in front of any extension piece or, in the absence of any extension piece, immediately in front of the codend. Article 4(i)(f) additionally requires that the panels be placed forward of any flapper or with the front end of the panel to the rear of any flapper by at least three flapper lengths.

In the light of the questions raised by the hon. Member the legislation and related instructions are currently being examined by Fisheries Departments to see whether there is any need for clarification in order to ensure that the objective of the legislation, to facilitate the escape of undersized immature fish, is achieved.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what actions the Government are taking in response to breaches by the French Government of EU rules on drift-net lengths; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: It is for the Commission to ensure that member states comply with European Union law and to institute infraction proceedings as necessary.

Straw Disposal Survey

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans she has to undertake a survey of straw disposal and utilisation following the 1994 harvest; and what are her plans in respect of the future publication of the results of the straw disposal survey.

Mr. Jack: A survey of straw disposal is planned for the autumn of 1994 and results will be published as normal through a statistics notice. In common with all Government statistical inquiries the content and frequency of this survey is subject to regular review.

Earnings

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the average earnings of regular full time hired workers on holdings in the special development areas, development areas and less-favoured areas for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Hill Farmers

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many less-favoured area hill farmers there were on land designated (a) a special development area and (b) development area, for each year since 1979 for England as a whole and for each county.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The table shows estimates of the number of LFA farms classified as SDA or DA are obtained from the annual June agricultural census. This information is available on a consistent basis only for the years 1987-1993.

Number of LFA holdings (wholly or mainly in the LFA) designated as wholly or mainly SDA or DA by County

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average occupancy rate of a hill farm in England.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against her Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Jack: There is currently one case of legal action being undertaken against this Ministry in relation to an alleged work-related upper limb disorder.

Animal Transportation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement about the transport of live animals.

Mr. Soames [holding answer 23 May 1994]: I refer to the reply which I gave to the hon. Members for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) and for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 24 March 1994 at column 370.

Written Answers to Questions

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. John M. Taylor: On the best information currently available expenditure on external consultants in 1992-93 was £3·455 million. It is not possible to isolate management and financial consultants as our records do not identify them in this way.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 139, what was the cost of the calls made on (a) car telephones and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

Mr. John M. Taylor: In 1993-94, the cost of calls made on car telephones was £4,621; and the cost of calls made on portable telephones was £35,023. The capital cost of this equipment was £113,547. The maintenance costs, that is, the fixed charges, for the same year were £111,644.

Gazumping

Dr. Spink: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what evidence he has of the current extent of gazumping of house purchasers; and what plans he has to control this.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No records are kept of the number of transactions in which "gazumping" occurs. The existing law is sufficiently flexible to allow the use of a variety of procedures or devices which preclude "gazumping", and buyers and sellers are free to adopt whichever best suits their needs. There are no plans to restrict this freedom.

ENVIRONMENT

Special Protection Areas

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the grounds on which an area may be excluded from a proposed special protection area under the European Union birds directive.

Mr. Atkins: Judgments by the European Court of Justice indicate that member states of the European Community have a margin of discretion in the selection of special protection areas and in the determination of their boundaries. The margin of discretion has not been defined by the court. Article 2 of the birds directive—79/409/EEC—requires member states to take requisite measures to maintain bird populations while taking account of economic and recreational requirements.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what advice he has received from English Nature as to whether the intertidal mudflats of Tipner lake within Portsmouth harbour qualify on scientific grounds for inclusion within the proposed special protection area and Ramsar site;

(2) when he expects to designate Portsmouth harbour as (a) a special protection area under the European Union birds directive and (b) as a Ramsar site.

Mr. Atkins: English Nature has advised that the potential Portsmouth harbour special protection area and Ramsar site is of special importance within the United Kingdom and the European Union for the range of wildfowl and wader species which use the site. In particular, it contains internationally important numbers of regularly occurring migratory species of wild birds, including dark-bellied brent goose, red-breasted merganser, black-tailed godwit and dunlin. English Nature advises also that the area within Tipner lake which falls within the proposed SPA boundary is an integral part of that site.

My right hon. Friend expects to designate an area of Portsmouth harbour as a special protection area and Ramsar site later this year after considering representations received.

Clay Target Shooting

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the results of research by the Building Research Establishment on public response to noise from clay target shooting; what further research is planned on the subject; and whether he will now approve the draft code of practice on clay target shooting under the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Mr. Atkins: Preliminary studies on response to clay target shooting noise were carried out by the Building Research Establishment, but, having regard to competing research priorities and the likely outputs from the project, it has not been pursued.

I do, however, recognise that there is some concern about this issue. In July 1993 the Institution of Environmental Health Officers, the Clay Pigeon Shooting Association and the British Shooting Sports Council were asked to produce an agreed code of practice on this activity. It was made clear that if an agreed code could not be produced then the decision not to introduce further restrictions over clay target shooting under the general development order would be reconsidered. I understand that the organisations involved hope to reach agreement on such a code in the near future. It will be for these organisations to decide whether the code is subsequently submitted for approval by the Secretary of State under section 71 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions his Department has had with the United States authorities regarding the disposal of hazardous wastes shipped to the United Kingdom for disposal from bases of the United States armed forces in Europe;

(2) if he will make a statement on the nature and quantities of hazardous wastes shipped to the United Kingdom for disposal from bases of the United States armed forces in Europe;

(3) by what means hazardous wastes that have been shipped to the United Kingdom from bases of the United States armed forces in Europe are disposed of.

Mr. Atkins: There have been no recent discussions between my Department and the United States authorities on the disposal of hazardous wastes from bases of the United States armed forces in Europe.

Notifications for the importation into the United Kingdom of hazardous wastes from such bases were received by Torfaen borough council in March. The notifications were for the disposal at Rechem's high temperature incinerator at Pontypool of the following:

formaldehyde, liquid pesticide (pyrethrin), adhesive, paint (laboratory waste):—1× 20,000kg consignment.

dilute nitric acid, acetic acid, sulphuric acid, ferric chloride solution (laboratory waste):—1× 20,000kg consignment.

cresylic acid and laboratory chemicals: sodium carbonate, magnesium chloride, sodium oxalate (laboratory waste):—1× 20,000kg consignment.

polychlorinated biphenyls (from redundant electrical equipment):—3× 60,000kg consignments; 4× 40,000kg consignments.

Rented Housing

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations, and from what organisations, the Government have received about their consultative document on access to local authority and housing association tenancies.

Sir George Young: We have now received nearly 10,000 responses from a wide variety of organisations, including local authorities, housing associations, and bodies campaigning on behalf of specific interests, as well as from individual members of the public.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when the Government will publish their response to public representations about their consultative document on access to local authority and housing association tenancies;

(2) what is the Government's response to the public representations about their consultative document on access to local authority and housing association tenancies.

Sir George Young: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) on 18 May, Official Report, column 796.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Baldry: Two.

Tenancy Agreements

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authority tenants in 1993 took legal action against their landlords for failing to satisfy the terms of the tenancy agreement; how many of these cases resulted in court action, and how many of the cases which resulted in court action were found in favour of the tenant;

(2) how many local authority tenants were taken to court by their landlords in 1993 for breach of the tenancy agreement;

(3) how many complaints of noise disturbance from local authority tenants went to court last year; and in how many of these cases the court found in favour of the tenant.

Sir George Young: This information is not held centrally.

Liverpool Housing Action Trust

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the Liverpool housing action trust has spent on consultants' fees since its inception.

Sir George Young: This is a matter for the Liverpool housing action trust. The chief executive will write to the hon. Member.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what evaluation he has commissioned of the prospective public expenditure savings arising from the announced reduction by United Kingdom Nirex Ltd. of the capacity of the planned national repository for nuclear waste;

(2) what discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and what interdepartmental discussions have taken place, on the cost implications of the proposed national repository for radioactive waste; and if he will place in the Library a copy of the review of the costs of the repository.

Mr. Atkins: Questions relating to the sponsorship of Nirex are a matter for my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. However, the cost implications of Nirex's proposed repository will be considered in the radioactive waste management review, announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 19 May, Official Report, columns 535-36. The Department proposes to publish the preliminary conclusions of the review later in the summer, as a basis for consultation.

Green Ministers

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the most recent meeting of Green Ministers was held; what matters were discussed; and what decisions were taken.

Mr. Atkins: Green Ministers met on 18 May 1994 to discuss progress on green housekeeping. Ministers agreed to keep their departmental strategies up to date, to revise their purchasing guidance to emphasise environmental factors including the use of recycled paper in packaging, to improve energy usage, and to assess the practicality of developing environmental management systems. Ministers agreed to meet again later in the year to review progress.

DNA Bank

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evaluation he has made of the environmental implications of the location of the first European DNA bank at Whitehaven.

Mr. Atkins: I am not aware of any environmental implications of this data bank.

Natural Gas Vehicles

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the conversion of vehicles to run on natural gas; and if he will make a statement about the benefits for the environment and air pollution of natural gas vehicles.

Mr. Atkins: My Department has received a number of interesting representations about vehicles fuelled by natural gas. It is clear that such vehicles can be quieter than conventional vehicles and that they can give rise to relatively low emissions of gaseous pollutants. There may be scope for them to offer a useful contribution towards environmental improvement.

Written Answers

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost of preparing written answers to parliamentary questions to his Department.

Mr. Baldry: Parliamentary questions are answered within the financial guidelines issued by the Treasury. No records are kept of the costs incurred in answering individual questions where the amounts involved are not in excess of these limits.

Planning Inspectorate Agency

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what performance targets he has set for the Planning Inspectorate Agency for the financial year 1994-95.

Mr. Baldry: The key objectives for the agency in 1994-95 remain to preserve the impartiality and quality of the inspectorate's work while seeking further to improve efficiency. I have set the following further key targets for the agency's work in England:

Timeliness:

(a) 80 per cent. of planning appeals by written representations to be decided within 18 weeks;

(b) To provide an inspector for local plan inquiries when requested within 26 weeks of the end of the objection period;

Financial:

(a) Unit costs of planning appeals decided by written representations to be held at or below £690;

(b) Recover 90 per cent. of receipts due within 8 weeks of invoice date;

Efficiency:

Generate a 3 per cent. efficiency improvement in running costs, as compared with 1993-94;

Quality:

(a) The number of justified complaints about the way Inspectors have carried out their duties, and the number of High Court challenges, should be less than one in every hundred decisions issued;

(b) The number of justified complaints about the way the Inspectorate handled the procedural aspects of casework should be less than one in every hundred cases received;

Volume:

To determine 15,500, appeals, subject to intake not declining;

Information and Guidance:

To complete a third customer survey by 31 December 1994.

These and other performance targets for the agency will be included in its business plan for 1994-95 which will be published shortly.

Separate targets for the agency's work in Wales are being announced today by my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales.

Coal Privatisation

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amendments he proposes to make to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order as a consequence of coal privatisation.

Mr. Baldry: It is essential that the planning system should provide continuity for the privatised industry, but it is equally important that operators should take responsibility for restoring sites once mining operations have ceased. We have today published for consultation draft amendments to the GDO and associated draft guidance which will provide such a framework.

Mines started before 1 July 1948 derive their planning permission from the general development order and surface development carried out at GDO mines before 1988 have no restoration conditions attached. The permission is personal to British Coal and its lessees or licensees.

After privatisation, in addition to the planning permission operators will need a licence from the Coal Authority unless they have an existing licence from British Coal.

As the existing GDO permission is personal to British Coal and its lessees or licensees, the GDO will need to be amended to grant permitted development rights for licensees of the Coal Authority to continue underground mining at GDO mines, otherwise there would be no planning permission for the continued extraction of coal at such sites.

The Coal Industry Bill provides a power for my right hon. Friend to attach conditions to the GDO permission for underground working requiring the restoration and aftercare of the pithead surface area. We propose that the new GDO permission for licensees of the Coal Authority for continued underground mining will be subject to such conditions. These will require the operator to submit a scheme for the restoration and aftercare of the site for the mineral planning authority's approval.

There are also a number of minor technical amendments needed to the GDO, broadly to change references to British Coal to the Coal Authority and to update definitions in line with the Coal Industry Bill.

I believe these proposals will provide the necessary planning continuity for the industry and ensure that sites are restored to a beneficial use once mining operations cease.

Sulphur Emissions

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the United Kingdom intends to sign the new United Nations Economic Commission for Europe protocol on reducing sulphur emissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. I plan to attend the ministerial session of the executive body of the convention on long-range transboundary air pollution in Oslo on 13-14 June and to sign for the United Kingdom the new protocol on the further reduction of sulphur emissions. The text of the protocol will be published as a Command Paper and laid before Parliament in due course.

Based on the concept of critical loads, which the United Kingdom played a leading part in developing, the protocol will require parties to reduce their sulphur emissions by specified amounts, depending in part on the quantity of their emissions and on the nature of their impact on the environment across Europe. The United Kingdom's obligations will be to make reductions, against 1980 emission levels, of 50 per cent. by 2000, 70 per cent. by 2005 and 80 per cent. by 2010.

These are challenging targets which will substantially deal with acidification problems in the United Kingdom within the time frame of our sustainable development strategy, in addition to providing substantial benefits for other European countries affected by our emissions. The targets will provide a stable long-term framework for planning by Government and industry. While it is possible that developments in the economy at large may result in earlier achievement of the targets, our national strategy and policies will be based firmly on the targets and timescales set out in the protocol.

Other key obligations in the new protocol will be for parties:

to apply specified emission limit values to major new combustion sources (ie. those whose construction is authorised after 31 December 1995);

to set specified national standards for the sulphur content of gasoil two years after entry into force of the Protocol;

for existing large combustion plants above 500 MW_{th}, to apply the specified emission limit values from 1 July 2004 subject to not entailing excessive costs or to apply equivalent emissions limitations as defined in the Protocol or to apply "other appropriate provisions" which deliver the necessary reductions;

for existing large combustion plants of 50-500 MW_{th}, to use the specified emission limit values as guidance from 1 July 2004; to produce within six months of entry into force of the Protocol a national strategy setting out how they will achieve their reductions; to submit reports on measures taken and progress in meeting the reduction targets;

for the UNECE to review progress in 1997.

The protocol also establishes a compliance committee which will monitor the delivery of the agreed targets.

The Government warmly welcome this protocol which will bring substantial environmental benefits. The effect of the protocol's provisions is to leave the United Kingdom general flexibility to decide how to meet our obligations and will place no new obligations on us as to the means by which the sulphur emissions reductions are to be secured. In particular, for existing plant, the terms of the protocol will allow us to maintain the approach taken in the United Kingdom's national plan under the EC large combustion plants directive and also allow the use of economic instruments. Therefore the provisions of the protocol will be without prejudice to HMIP's obligations under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to apply BATNEEC —best available techniques not entailing excessive cost —in deciding on authorisations on a site-by-site basis. Our strategy for implementing the protocol, on which we shall be consulting in due course, will met our obligations in a way which is cost-effective, appropriate to our national circumstances, and consistent with our economic and environmental objectives.

Capital Receipts

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the results of the capital receipts holiday which ended on 31 December 1993 for each local authority, with the amounts raised.

Mr. Curry [pursuant to his answer, 11 May 1994, Official Report, column 170]: I regret that one figure for the London borough of Lewisham was given incorrectly. I have arranged for a revised table to be placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the budgeted change in balances 1993-94, (b) the revised estimated change in balances 1993-94, (c) the estimated change in balances 1994-95, (d) the level of balances of financial reserves as at 31 March 1994 and (e) the estimated level of balances or financial reserves as at 31 March 1995 for each local authority and in total; and if he will state the sources of the information.

Mr. Gummer: The latest available information as reported for each local authority is given in tables which I have arranged to be placed in the Library of the House. The estimated change in balances in 1993-94 and levels at 1 April 1994 are subject to substantial amendment as authorities finalise their accounts; in general the amount actually drawn down from reserves is substantially less than suggested by local authorities' initial budgets. This is illustrated by the total figures given in the table; 1991-92 and 1992-93 figures have been added as these are the last years for which final figures are available.

Local and Regional Government

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the amount and proportion of general government expenditure which is (a) directly controlled by and (b) partly or indirectly controlled by institutions of local and/or regional government, in each country of the European Union, with averages for the European Union as a whole.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

Information on the degree of control is not available. However, total local government as a percentage of general government expenditure is shown in the table for the year 1991, the latest published year. The information given is under the European system of accounts definitions which allows for comparison of European Union countries on the same basis.

PRIME MINISTER

Baroness Thatcher (Visits)

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the names and companies of all the representatives of British companies who accompanied the former Prime Minister during her visit to Jordan in September 1985.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, no representatives of British companies accompanied the Prime Minister on this visit.

TRANSPORT

Porous Asphalt

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what studies his Department has undertaken into the use of porous asphalt in the United Kingdom;

(2) on how many occasions in the last five years where commercial vehicles are likely to use a motorway, at the rate of over 4,000 vehicles per lane per day, permission has been given for the use of porous asphalt in the construction of the road;

(3) if he will set out the criteria by which decisions have been made to use porous asphalt on motorways, or other developments, in the United Kingdom in the last five years;

(4) if he will list the developments where porous asphalt was used on motorways and trunk roads in the last 10 years;

(5) what EC directives or regulations relate to the use of porous asphalt on motorways or trunk roads.

Mr. Key: These five questions concerning the use of porous asphalt relate to operational matters of the Highways Agency. I have asked the chief executive, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Mike O'Brien, dated 20 May 1994:

The Minister for Roads and Traffic, Mr. Robert Key, has asked me to write to you in response to the five questions you asked relating to the use of porous asphalt.

The Department, in conjunction with TRL and industry, has been investigating the design and production of porous asphalt surfacings for many years including taking account of developments abroad. This work included laboratory tests as well as longer term road trials to optimise the performance of porous asphalt. These trials included sites on the A38 at Burton on Trent, the M1 south of Leeds and the M6 north of Junction 18 in Cheshire.

The successful outcome of these trials led to the Minister's announcement on 28 July 1992, that porous asphalt surfacing could be used on schemes in future where the conditions were suitable, benefits outweigh the higher cost and the needs for more expensive winter maintenance and more frequent resurfacing. Porous asphalt is not suitable for use on all roads. The criteria on which decisions are based for adopting porous asphalt surfacings are set out in Volume 7 of the Department's Design Manual for Roads and Bridges at document HD27/94 entitled "Pavement Construction Methods" and published in January 1994. These advise it is not used where traffic exceeds 4,000 commercial vehicles per lane per day.

Use of porous asphalt surfacing has been approved for a number of schemes within criteria laid down. Additionally, use has been approved on two lengths of the M25 where the traffic exceeds 4,000 commercial vehicles per lane per day in order to gain experience of the more durable mixtures at higher traffic levels.

Apart from the trial applications mentioned above, two other projects are under construction where porous asphalt is due to be laid. The schemes are:

A5 Fazely-Two Gates-Wilnecote BP
A50 Blyth Bridge-Queensway Improvement

The above information relates purely to roads in England. Porous asphalt has also been laid by local authorities on roads for which they are responsible.

Use of porous asphalt, as with any other surfacing material, is subject to EC directives and regulations on safety. Additionally specifiers are bound within the Public Procurement Directive. In accordance with this requirement the Technical guidance, as given in document HD27/94, was notified to the EC under the terms of the Notification Directive.

Shipping

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions are in force on the nationalities of crew and officers of fishing and merchant vessels registered under the national flags of (a) Denmark, (b) Italy, (c) Greece, (d) Germany and (e) the Netherlands.

Mr. Norris: With regard to merchant vessels I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Walley) on 28 April, Hansard, column 598. The Department does not collect information on manning requirements for fishing vessels.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many foreign-owned merchant and fishing vessels are registered under the national flags of (a) France, (b) Germany, (c) Denmark and (d) the Netherlands.

Mr. Norris: The Government do not collect these data. To obtain reliable information from other sources would involve disproportionate cost.

M62 Relief Road

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many properties have been purchased by his Department within the Bury, South constituency arising out of his proposals for the M62 relief road;

(2) how many properties have been let by his Department within the Bury, South constituency arising out of his proposals for the M62 relief road; and how many of such properties have their rent paid in whole or in part out of public funds.

Mr. Key: These are operational matters for the Highways Agency. The chief executive has written to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Sumberg, dated 23 May 1994:

I refer to your two questions to the Secretary of State for Transport tabled in the House for written reply on 20 May, about properties purchased and let in connection with the proposed M62 Relief Road. As Robert Key has explained to the House, these are operational matters on which I have been asked to reply.

We have now completed purchase on 89 properties within the Bury South constituency. Of these, 17 have been let by our interim letting agent. As far as we are aware, none of these properties has their rents paid in whole or part, from public funds. In all cases our letting agents have provided an employer's reference for the tenant.

As I explained in a previous reply, a full management agreement will be offered for tender shortly. The present agents are having to deal with a large number of properties becoming available over a short period. In addition, we are finding that some properties require repair and maintenance before they are in a suitable condition for letting.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the (a) budgeted and (b) actual expenditure on the abandoned King's Cross station project;

(2) what was the (a) budgeted and (b) actual expenditure on the abandoned south London route alignment to the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave on 27 January 1994, Official Report, column 393. Figures for budgeted, as opposed to actual expenditure, are not readily available.

RAF Northolt

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to increase the daily number of civil aircraft movements permitted at Royal Air Force Northolt; what discussions he has held on these proposals with the Secretary of State for Defence; and what consultation he has had with the local hon. Member or neighbouring residents about them.

Mr. Norris: There are no such proposals.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will instruct the Franchising Director to include the existing sleeper services between Scotland and England in the contract with operators of the west coast main line.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend has instructed the Franchising Director that his specification of minimum service levels for railway passenger services is to be based on that being provided by BR immediately prior to franchising, taking into account the existence of and justification for seasonal variations in service schedules. The Franchising Director will consult the appropriate local authorities and rail users consultative committees on his proposals for the minimum service specifications for franchised operations on the west coast main line in due course.

Transport and Environmental Strategy

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to provide a long-term integrated transport and environmental strategy after consultation with the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 24 May 1994]: "Sustainable Development: the UK Strategy", which was the result of detailed discussions between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and me, set out the principles by which the Government develop their transport policies. These include the following aims:

> —To strike the right balance between the ability of transport to serve economic development and the ability to protect the environment and sustain further quality of life.
> —To provide for the economic and social needs for access with less need for travel.
> —To take measures which reduce the environmental impact of transport and influence the rate of traffic growth.
> —To ensure that users pay the full social and environmental cost of their transport decisions, so improving the overall efficiency of those decisions for the economy as a whole and bringing environmental benefits.

We are pursuing a range of policies consistent with these aims.

Naval Exercises (English Channel)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the closure to traffic of an area of the English channel on 5 and 6 April due to a Sea Wolf missile failing to explode during a Royal Navy exercise.

Mr. Hanley: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 4 May, Official Report, column 550.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Hypnosis

Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the use of hypnosis by the police in obtaining evidence for the courts.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Methods of investigation are a matter of operational discretion for chief officers of police. In 1988 the Home Office issued guidance to the police discouraging the use of hypnosis in the investigation of offences, on the grounds that evidence obtained by this method would be likely to be both unreliable and inadmissible in court, as well as carrying a risk of harm to the witness. We have no plans to issue further guidance on this subject.

Alcohol-related Crime

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistical information his Department maintains about alcohol-related crime.

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office collects information on the number of offences of driving after consuming alcohol or taking drugs. Numbers of offences of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs are included with the number of offences of causing death by dangerous driving. The figures are published in Home Office Statistical Bulletins "Motoring Offences" and "Notifiable Offences", copies of which are held in the Library.

The 1988 British Crime Survey provides some evidence on how many victims of violent crime said the offender was drunk. Of all the violent incidents covered in the survey, 44 per cent. were said to involve a drunken offender. One out of two victims of street assaults cited a drunken offender, and four out of 10 female victims of domestic violence did so.

Wheel Clamping

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement on the outcome of his Department's consultation paper, "Wheelclamping on Private Ground."

Mr. Maclean: We are still considering the possible options for regulating wheel clamping on private land and will make our conclusions known as soon as possible.

Immigration Detainees

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people entering the United Kingdom in 1993 were detained by immigration officials; and from this figure what percentage were released without charge.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The available information relates to passengers detained overnight or longer, and there were 5,571 such persons in 1993. Persons detained under Immigration Act powers are generally not charged with a criminal offence, but on release are either removed from the country or granted leave to enter. There is no central record of how such cases are resolved.

Greyhounds

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to his answer of 12 April, Official Report, columns 2-3, for how much longer the project licence issued under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for the use of non purpose-bred greyhounds in research will be valid;

(2) if any of the greyhounds used in scientific procedures in 1992 were ex-greyhound racing registered dogs;

(3) if any exemptions have been granted under article 10(3) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to allow the use of non purpose-bred greyhounds since 1992-93.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The project licence in question terminates on 1 June 1994.

In 1992, 10 procedures were carried out on four greyhounds which were racing registered at the time of the study. We are not aware that any of the other non purpose-bred dogs used in procedures in 1992 were ex-racing registered dogs.

No exemptions have been granted since 1992-93. This would not preclude the use of non purpose-bred greyhounds under project licences previously issued.

Special Police Protection

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) royal households and (b) special households in total attract police protection in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howard: For security reasons it would not be right to provide any details of the properties concerned.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Howard: There are five members of staff in the main Home Office who are currently taking legal action against the Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

I have asked the Director General of the Prison Service to write to the hon. Member about the number of such legal actions being taken in the Prison Service.

Police Officer Activities (Report)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the reports of activities of a police officer, details of which have been sent to him.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand from the Commissioner that he is considering the paper forwarded to him by my hon. Friend.

Immigration

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 May Official Report, columns 10-11 on leave to remain on the basis of a common law relationship, (a) how many of the partnerships had children and (b) how many of the relationships had been in existence for more than four years.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is not available in the statistics.

Prison Staff Ratios

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present ratio of prisoners to prison officers, taking into account staff away on escort duties, in court and on sick leave.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Dame Jill Knight, dated 25 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the ratio of prisoners to prison officers, taking into account staff away on escort duties, in court and on sick leave.

The ratio of prisoners to prison officers varies between establishments, but, as at 19 May 1994, the overall ratio of prisoners to prison officers, including senior officers and principal officers, was 2·01 : 1. Figures for the number of staff scheduled to be on duty on that day, whether at their establishment or on court or escort duty, and of those on sick leave, are not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider making a distinction between purpose-bred and non-purpose bred cats and dogs when compiling any future animal statistics used in licensed scientific procedures.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Government have no plans to make the distinction suggested. However, changes which are being introduced to the statistical system will make it possible to distinguish, from 1995 onwards, between dogs and cats which have been bred at or obtained from a designated breeding establishment, and those which have been obtained from other sources.

Specialist Operations

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the specialist operations at Scotland Yard together with their annual cost for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In the interests of security, it is Home Office policy not to reveal details, including costs, of individual special operation branches. The annual staffing cost of the branches to 31 March 1994 is around £158 million. This figure represents the average of salaries for the ranks and grades involved.

Obscene Publications

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what recent discussions he has had with the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis about the future of the obscene publications branch; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent representations he has received from right hon. and hon. Members concerning the future of the obscene publications branch; and how many of those representations have (a) opposed and (b) supported the disbanding of that branch;

Mr. David Alton: (1) whether it is the policy of his Department to close the obscene publications squad;

(2) what plans there are for the disbandment of the obscene publications branch at New Scotland Yard; what is the reason for such action; and what assessment he has made of the effect of such a measure on the operational capability of the police, both in London and nationally.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Metropolitan police headquarters functions and specialist units, such as the obscene publications branch, fall within scope of the Commissioner's restructuring exercise, which aims to make the best possible use of resources and to place functions where they are most appropriate. My right hon. and learned Friend has discussed this matter with the Commissioner during their regular meetings.

Overseas Domestic Workers

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the maltreatment of overseas domestic workers; and what measures he is taking in response to the recent cross-party delegation on this issue.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None; but we consider representations carefully and keep the general arrangements for the overseas domestic workers scheme under review.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were granted entry clearance at posts abroad to come in to the United Kingdom as overseas domestic workers under the 1980 concession after 31 August 1993.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is not available.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received regarding overseas domestic workers in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In the past year, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have received 22 letters from right hon. and hon. Members and noble Lords about the exceptional arrangements for the admission of domestic workers from overseas. I met a delegation led by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) and Lord Hylton. A number of letters have been received from organisations and members of the public.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many overseas domestic workers have applied for a visa extension since August 1993; and how many of these applications have been granted.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The readily available data indicate that some 600 overseas domestic workers were granted further leave to remain in the second half of 1993.

Sheehy Report

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's present views as to further implementation of the Sheehy committee report.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend announced on 28 October 1993 the Government's response to the recommendations of the inquiry into police responsibilities and rewards.

Yemen (Somali Nationals)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what special arrangements the Government have instituted regarding the issue of entry clearance to family members of Somali nationals resident in the United Kingdom who are stranded in Yemen.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have been asked to reply.

We have no special arrangements for the issue of entry clearances in Yemen for any single nationality. Although the visa service has been suspended following the evacuation of staff last week, inquiries can be addressed to the British embassy in Sana'a which remains open.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Counsel

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list for each of the past 10 years those occasions on which the Office of Parliamentary Counsel has been requested to supply amendments or new clauses to Back Benchers for use in debate on private Members Bills in which Departments have an interest.

Mr. Newton: This information is not recorded.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will institute an inquiry into the use of the Office of Parliamentary Counsel by Departments to draft amendments or new clauses for use by Back Benchers in relation to debate on private Members Bills, and the effect on the timetable for preparation of amendments to Government legislation occasioned by such use of the personnel of the office.

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so.

EMPLOYMENT

European Social Fund

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to provide support for voluntary organisations funded by the European social fund who have received no payments from the fund for the financial year commenced in January.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The responsibility for the delays in payment under the European social fund rests with the European Commission. The Commission will not release money from the fund until it has approved the United Kingdom's plan for 1994 to 1999. The plan was submitted in November 1993, and despite pressure from this Department, the Commission has only just begun negotiations with us. The Government are pressing the Commission to approve the plan as soon as possible.

The Department has parliamentary authority to make payments as an agent of the Commission only once the funds have arrived. We sympathise with the position in which the voluntary organisations find themselves as a result of the Commission's delays. We are considering urgently whether we can do anything to alleviate the problems they are facing.

Diploma Directive

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he intends to issue a consultation document on the implementation of the Council directive for a second general system to supplement the second diploma directive 89/48/EEC.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Work on implementation has begun including consultation with other Government Departments. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consult on proposed legislation in due course.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Six.

Personnel Data Processing

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Empolyment what was the total expenditure on staff and training costs relating to the aborted personnel data processing system.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total expenditure on staff and training costs in respect of the Department's personnel data system was £2·70 million.

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the answer of 13 May, Official Report, columns 264-65, on the moneys paid to McDonnell Douglas in respect of personnel data processing, if he will break down expenditure on other items.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Further to the written reply of 13 May, on amounts paid to McDonnell Douglas on the personnel data processing system, the expenditure on other items is broken down as follows:

Project Management	159,375
Contractors	88,757
Training	33,812
Maintenance of IT Equipment	69,770

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the organisations and people, other than McDonnell Douglas, to whom payments were made in respect of the aborted personnel data processing system, together with the nature of the work done.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The following table lists the organisations and people, other than McDonnell Douglas, to whom payments were made in respect of the personnel data processing system. The table also describes the nature of the work done.

Organisation	Nature of work
ASK/INGRES	Technical Audit
Computer People North	Conversion Programming
Crow Associates	Management and Organisational review
DBI Associates	Project Risk Analysis and Evaluation Project Management
Duhig Berry	Advice on use of PRINCE
Ernst & Young	Business Analysis

Young Workers Directive

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the young workers directive is next to be considered by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I expect the young workers directive to be considered at the next meeting of the Labour and Social Affairs Council on 22 June.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he is to issue strategic guidance to TECs this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government will issue strategic guidance to all training and enterprise councils in England tomorrow.

I am pleased that this year's guidance "TECs: Towards 2000" is being issued jointly with my right hon. Friends the President of the Board of Trade and the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Education, Transport and the Home Department.

"TECs: Towards 2000" presents the Government's strategic agenda for TECs, and emphasises their key role in driving national competitiveness at local level. TECs are asked to address in their corporate plans the major challenges and opportunities for local economic development and regeneration in their areas.

Copies of "TECs: Towards 2000" are available in the Library.

Employee Involvement

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the Government's policy on employee involvement in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Hunt: We believe that, to be successful, employee involvement must be voluntary and flexible, unlike that which would be imposed by the European Commission's draft directive on European works councils. I have today published "The Competitive Edge", a new booklet which gives examples of some of the many forms of effective employee involvement practice in the United Kingdom. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Employment Benefits

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the main employment benefits in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the Pacific rim countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 17 May 1994]: In the United Kingdom the main, statutory, employment benefits include redundancy payments, maternity leave and sick pay, as well as protection against unfair dismissal and harassment, or discrimination at work.

The following table, based on information available to the Employment Department, shows that, mostly, these benefits exist in the Pacific rim countries of Hong Kong, Singapore, South Korea and Taiwan. However, coverage of the work force and the value of these benefits varies considerable from country to country.

EMPLOYMENT BENEFITS IN THE UNITED KINGDOM—MAY 1994

Redundancy Payments

Statutory minimum payments depend on age and length of service and are subject to a maximum (full details appear in the July 1993 Employment Gazette page 317). Employees are covered if: they have worked for two years for a minimum of 16 hours a week; or have worked for five years between 8 and 16 hours a week.

Maternity Leave

90 per cent. of earnings for six weeks plus £47·95 a week for 12 weeks. Eligibility is on the same basis as for redundancy payments. However, the rules for maternity pay are being revised. For more detail on the current rules, and the future requirements, see "Changes in Maternity Pay, Proposals for Implementing the EC Pregnant Workers Directive" published by the Department of Social Security (DSS) August 1993.

Sick Pay

The Statutory minimum is related to the employees earnings and is payable for a maximum 28 weeks. All employees are covered except for a few groups such as those on contracts of 3 months or less. More detail is available from the DSS Guide NI270 "Employer's Manual on Statutory Sick Pay".

Protection Against Harassment Discrimination
Race and sex discrimination at work is generally prohibited. The clauses are set out in: the Equal Pay Act 1970; the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976. These rights apply to all employees irrespective of length of service or hours of work. Other rights such as protection against unfair dismissal are subject to the same qualifying period as redundancy payments above.

Employment benefits in Pacific rim countries

Singapore

Redundancy Payments
Can be claimed provided employee has been employed for at least 3 years. No amounts stipulated by law.

Maternity Leave
8 weeks paid maternity leave if the employee has been employed for 6 months or more.

Sick Pay
14 days paid sick leave per year, in addition to any time spent in hospital up to a limit of 60 days. Employee must have worked for at least 12 months to qualify.

Protection Against Harassment/Discrimination
Anyone who thinks they have been unfairly dismissed may appeal to the Minister for Labour. If the Minister finds against the company they must either reinstate or compensate the worker.

Taiwan

Redundancy Payments, Maternity Leave, Sick Pay
There is legal entitlement to these benefits but only in certain industries. Maternity leave cannot exceed 8 weeks, the value of the other benefits depends on a number of factors including length of service, age and sex. The industries covered are: Agriculture, Forestry and Fishing; Mining and Quarrying; Manufacturing; Construction; Water, Electricity and Gas Supply; Transportation, Warehousing and Communications; Mass Media; other industries designated by relevant central level authority.

Protection Against Harassment/Discrimination
There is some protection against unfair dismissal.

Hong Kong

Redundancy Payments
An employee who has worked for an employer for more than 2 year's is entitled to two-thirds of normal monthly salary for every years service.

Maternity Leave
Maximum 10 weeks leave at two-thirds normal pay, as long as the employee has been in continuous employment for at least 18 hours a week for four consecutive weeks.

Sick Pay
Two-thirds normal pay for continuous sickness days of at least four. Same qualifying criteria as Maternity Leave/Pay.

Protection Against Harassment/Discrimination
Employers may not dismiss pregnant employees who have been in continuous employment for at least 12 weeks, or employees who are on sick leave due to occupational injury or disease. Employees who are absent because they have to give evidence in criminal proceedings are similarly protected. In all these cases if the employee is dismissed compensation must be paid.

South Korea

Redundancy Payments
Employers must pay 30 days wages for each year worked. This applies only to companies with 5 or more employees, for those firms with fewer employees the Ministry of Labour sets down guidelines depending on the company's status.

Maternity Leave
A maximum of 60 days paid leave.

Sick Pay
There is no statutory sick pay, although employers must pay for 50 per cent. of medical fees—the government pays the rest.

Protection Against Harassment/Discrimination
Discrimination based on sex, nationality, religion or social position is prohibited by the Labour Standards Act.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Attorney-General what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by the Law Officers' Departments in 1992-93.

The Attorney-General: The expenditure was as follows:

Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers	Nil
Crown Prosecution Service	48,100
Serious Fraud Office	108,820
Treasury Solicitor's Department	335,000

Serious Fraud Office

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects to lay before Parliament and publish the annual report of the Serious Fraud Office for the year 1993-94.

The Attorney-General: The annual report for the SFO for 1993-94 was laid before Parliament at 11.00 am today and then published. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Portable Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 174, what was the cost of calls made on (a) car and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

The Attorney-General: The costs are listed in the table.

	Car telephone calls (£)	Portable telephone calls (£)	Cost of equipment[1] (£)	Maintenance costs (£)
Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers	975	—	2,340	190
Treasury Solicitor's Department	—	1,650	4,890	—
Crown Prosecution Service	6,980	300	26,800	690
Serious Fraud Office	—	3,410	11,150	—
Total	7,955	5,360	45,180	880

[1] Including subscriptions and rental.

EDUCATION

Teacher Training Agency

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education for what reasons the stipulations in his notes on the clauses of the Education Bill on the qualifications for members of the Teacher Training Agency in terms of experience and capacity in teaching, higher education, or teacher training were not reflected in the advertisement for the appointment of a chief executive to the agency.

Mr. Robin Squire: The chief executive's main duty will be to manage the executive functions of the agency. He or she will be directly accountable for the control of the agency's expenditure and will have a role quite different from that of the other members of the board. This is reflected in the advertisement for the post.

The Secretary of State will take into account in making all appointments to the agency the requirements of clause 2 of the Education Bill, which include not only those mentioned by the hon. Member, but experience in industrial, commercial or financial matters, or the practice of any profession.

Student Statistics

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many third level students from (a) the Republic of Ireland, (b) other European Community countries and (c) non-European Community countries were enrolled in universities and colleges in England and Wales in each year since 1984-85; and what has been the cost or income in each category to the education budget.

Mr. Boswell: The following are the numbers of students for England and Wales which are readily available:

	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93
Republic of Ireland	2,615	3,072	3,756
Other EC	17,360	21,664	25,243
Non-EC	49,194	51,177	53,422

I will write to the hon. Member with figures for the earlier years.

The costs of provision for students from individual EC member states are not recorded separately. For 1991-92 the total cost to the education budget attributable to students from EC states studying in England and Wales is estimated at approximately £105 million. For 1990-91 and 1989-90, the equivalent figures for expenditure attributable to students from other EC member states were in the region of £90 million and £75 million respectively. British nationals studying elsewhere in the European Community enjoy reciprocal rights. Students from non-EC countries are expected to meet the full cost of their tuition. Income from non-EC students is credited to the host institution and not to the education budget.

Balanced against these costs is the benefit to the United Kingdom economy from the money spent in this country by students from overseas.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many teachers have sought early retirement in each of the last three years for which figures are available because of (a) redundancy and (b) illness; and if he will break the figures down by local authority and regionally for grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) on 12 May, Official Report, columns 207-08.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

National Environmental Technology Centre

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the expenditure on consultancy of AEA Technology Ltd., the National Environmental Technology Centre and its predecessors over the last five years, distinguishing between consultancy on management, marketing and technical issues.

Mr. Heseltine: Consultancy work for AEA Technology is a management matter for the Atomic Energy Authority. With regard to Warren Spring Laboratory, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on Monday 16 May 1994, Official Report, columns 302-05.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Heseltine: There are no cases in the Department of Trade and Industry where proceedings have been issued.

In three cases claimants are currently seeking damages from the Department through their solicitors.

Company Investigations

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the inspectors to inquire into the affairs of Dunlop Holdings Ltd. were appointed; when their inquiry was completed; what are the business connections of the inspectors; what is the cost of the investigation; how it has been disbursed to each inspector; what reports have been published; and when he will publish the final reports.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The inspectors were appointed on 25 July 1980 and made a substantial interim report on 18 December 1980, a second interim report on 10 March 1981 and a final report on 12 November 1981. Their first interim report was published on 17 February 1981 and it was decided not to publish their other reports. Both inspectors were departmental officers and the cost of their investigation is not available.

Future Large Aircraft

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has had concerning the future large aircraft; and if he will make a statement on this aircraft.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department has received many representations on the future large aircraft programme. The decision on the replacement of the existing Hercules fleet is a matter for the Ministry of Defence and my Department is in close touch with the MoD on the industrial implications of the programme.

Plugs and Sockets

Mr. Congdon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has yet received the consultant's report on possible CENELEC—European Committee for Electrotechnical Standardisation—proposals on plug and socket standards.

Mr. McLoughlin: The report by the British Standards Institution Research Association has now been received and is being made available thorugh HMSO. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

East-West Business Forum

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the outcome of the east-west business forum that took place in Warsaw on 5 and 6 May 1994 and preceded the west-east conference of Ministers of Economy, Industry and Trade.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The business forum drew up a business declaration which highlighted the areas of reform that needed to be addressed by the central and east European countries and areas where G7 countries could help. This was discussed by the conference which agreed that the declaration should be given wide circulation. I have placed a copy of the declaration and of the conference conclusions in the Library of the House.

Deregulation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will set out (a) the terms of reference of the deregulation panel, (b) its membership and (c) the terms of appointment of the members of the panel.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make a statement on the functions of the deregulation panel before the Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill receives Royal Assent;

(2) what are the functions of the deregulation panel established by his Department;

(3) when the deregulation panel was established;

(4) who are the members of the deregulation panel; and on what dates they were invited to join the panel;

(5) when the deregulation panel first met; and how many times it has met.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The formation of the deregulation task force, to be chaired by the right hon. Francis Maude, was announced on 19 January 1994. A number of appointments have been made and some work has been started, but other individuals are still being approved. It would therefore be inappropriate to announce some names but not all. When the task force has its full quorum, an announcement of the membership and its terms of reference will be made.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the budget of the deregulation panel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: The deregulation task force does not have a separate individual budget. The costs of administrative support are part of the deregulation unit budget, which is published in the departmental supply estimates.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make the minutes of the deregulation panel available to hon. Members.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: Minutes of the meetings of the deregulation task force will not be available. However, the task force will publish an annual report.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the relationship between the deregulation panel and the deregulation unit.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: The deregulation task force will work closely with the deregulation unit, which is the focal point for the deregulation initiative across Whitehall.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the relationship between the deregulation panel and the deregulation task forces.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: The deregulation task force is the successor body to the seven business deregulation task forces, whose proposals for reform were published on 19 January 1994 and the eighth charities and voluntary organisations task force, which has completed its work and is due to report shortly.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the level of remuneration of each member of the deregulation panel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: Individuals will not receive payment for their work as members of the deregulation task force.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the term of office of each member of the deregulation panel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: Members of the deregulation task force will be appointed for an initial period of two years.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the criteria used to appoint (a) the deregulation panel as a whole and (b) each member of the deregulation panel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: The purpose of the deregulation task force is to help my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to promote deregulation which will enhance the competitiveness of United Kingdom business and the effectiveness of the voluntary sector. The criterion for membership is the ability to contribute to this purpose.

Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list (a) the occupations and (b) the political affiliation of each member of the deregulation panel.

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: The formation of the deregulation task force, to be chaired by the right hon. Francis Maude, was announced on 19 January 1994. A number of appointments have been made and some work has been started, but other individuals are still being approached. It would therefore be inappropriate to announce some names but not all. When the task force has its full quorum, an announcement to the membership and its terms of reference will be made. This will include the occupations of members appointed. The Department does not hold information on the political affiliations of appointees to advisory bodies. Appointments are made on the basis of the person judged best for the job; political affiliation is not a factor.

Teaching Company Scheme

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the progress of the teaching company scheme.

Mr. Sainsbury: The teaching company scheme is now in its 19th year of operation; following changes made in 1986, it is now widely regarded as one of the most successful mechanisms of technology transfer and has been replicated in several other countries. TCS helps firms to access technology in United Kingdom universities by enabling them to employ young graduates to install specific technologies or processes in the firm. The graduates are jointly supervised by the firm and the university.

Graduates receive a salary, paid through the university, which comprises an element of public sector support from one or more sponsors, together with a contribution from the firm.

As at 16 May 1994, 509 TCS programmes are in progress, involving 586 graduates and 82 universities. Over 50 per cent. of TCS programmes take place in small and medium-sized enterprises; it is intended to increase this proportion to about 60 per cent.

Although conceived as a joint DTI/SERC scheme, TCS has expanded its sponsorship base to include other research councils and government departments. Eleven organisations now act as sponsors.

A recent interdepartmental review of the scheme concluded that there were areas where its internal operation could be improved. Copies of the review have been lodged in the Library of the House.

Among a wide-ranging list of recommendations, four stand out:

1. It will no longer be necessary for individual programmes of interest to DTI, EPSRC or other sponsors to receive joint sponsorship; the effect of this will be to allow each sponsor to target more clearly those types of firm or technology that it wishes to support.

2. Longer term planning within TCS will be improved, by the production of a 5-year strategic plan, amended on an annual basis and supplemented by an annual business plan.

3. The managerial focus of the scheme will be sharpened by the nomination of DTI as lead sponsor department. DTI will ensure that the scheme is delivered according to the wishes of the sponsors as a whole.

4. The scheme will be supervised by a new Teaching Company Scheme Board, to be chaired by Sir Anthony Gill. The Board will comprise the following members, providing a balanced representation of industrial and academic interests:

Name
Professor John Goodman	Chairman: Manchester School of Management
Professor David Johns	Vice Chancellor: University of Bradford
Dr. James Kinloch	Chairman: The Kinloch Electronics Group
Professor Stan Mason	Principal and Vice-Chancellor: Glasgow Caledonian University
Professor John Midwinter	Head of Electronic and Electrical Engineering Department: University College London
Mr. Colin Mitchell	Communications and Corporate Mail Manager: ICI
Mr. William Morris	Vice-President: Short Brothers plc
Dr. A. W. Nelson	Managing Director: Epitaxial Products Ltd.

Dr. John Parnaby, managing director, Lucas Applied Technology Ltd. chairman of the LINK steering group, will join the board as an observer. DTI and the Office of Science and Technology will also be represented on the board.

The board will be responsible for the successful continuation of TCS and its development to include new initiatives such as the teaching company centres and proposals to introduce the TCS concept into colleges of further education announced in the White Paper on Competitiveness, Cm. 2563.

Coal Industry Privatisation

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how he proposes to ensure the funding of British Coal Enterprise after the privatisation of British Coal.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 23 May 1994]: No decisions have been taken on the longer-term future of British Coal Enterprise Ltd. In the mean time the 1994 Coal Industry Restructuring Grants Order, approved in the House on 19 May, will enable the funding of BCE to continue for a further year.

WALES

Private Members' Bills

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct parliamentary counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Redwood: I am advised there have been no such requests or instructions since April 1992.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the level of provision made in Wales to assist those disabled by multiple sclerosis.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The provision of assistance for people with a disability, including those with multiple sclerosis, is the responsibility of health authorities and local authorities.

Whilst separate analyses in relation to specific conditions are not regularly made locally, the arrangements for social care planning have identified the needs of all people with a disability. How these needs can best be met is set out in the social care plans for each county and the implications for the NHS are reflected in the local strategies for health produced by health authorities.

Gwerin y Coed

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will review the level of grant given to the Gwerin y Coed, Woodcraft Folk for Wales, by his Department for 1994-95.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No. The size of the grant reflects the limited extent of Gwerin y Coed's youth work in Wales.

Care and Repair Wales

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set out the reasons why his Department decided to defer notification to Care and Repair Wales of the financial grant which will be made to it for the financial year 1994-95 until June 1994; and whether he will review this decision and make available as soon as possible a definite timetable on which care and repair plans can be based.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Both Care and Repair Cymru and 16 local schemes have already been offered funding for the first quarter of 1994-95. I am now making them an offer for the remainder of 1994-95.

Land Authority for Wales

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the board members of the Land Authority for Wales, their full-time occupations and the companies which employ them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: A list of the board members of the Land Authority for Wales which details their employment is held in the Library of the House. Those board members who have full-time occupations are employed by:

R. P. V. Rees: Coopers and Lybrand
R. W. S. Knight: Cooke and Arkwright
T. J. Mahoney; Self Employed Retailer

Each of them has arrangements with their business to make the necessary time available for LAW.

Planning Inspectorate Agency

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what performance targets he has set for the planning inspectorate agency's work in Wales for the financial year 1994-95.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The key objectives for the agency in Wales in 1994-95 remain to preserve the impartiality and quality of the inspectorate's work while seeking further to improve efficiency. The agency's key performance targets in Wales will be:

Timeliness

(a) Eighty per cent. of planning appeals by written representations to be decided within 17 weeks;
(b) To provide an inspector for local plan inquiries when requested within 26 weeks of the end of the objection period;

Financial

(a) Unit costs of planning appeals decided by written representations not to exceed £690;
(b) Recover 90 per cent. of receipts due within 8 weeks of invoice date;

Efficiency

Generate a 3 per cent. efficiency improvement in running costs as compared with 1993-94;

Quality

(a) The number of justified complaints about the way in which Inspectors have carried out their duties, and the number of successful challenges in the High Court, to be less than one in every hundred decisions issued;
(b) The number of justified complaints about the way in which the Inspectorate handled the procedural aspects of casework to be less than one in every hundred decisions issued;

Volume

To determine 1,050 appeals, subject to intake not declining;

Information and Guidance

To determine a third customer survey by 31 December 1994.

These and other performance targets for the agency will be included in its business plan for 1994-95 which will be published shortly.

Separate timeliness and volume targets for the agency's work in England are being announced today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment.

TREASURY

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Nelson: None.

Alcohol (Illegal Resale)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to publicise the telephone hotline to which members of the public may report the illegal resale of personal imports of alcoholic liquor; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The launch of the anti-bootlegging hotline on 27 April was extensively reported in the national and trade press and on television. Customs and I will continue to publicise the hotline—0800 901 901—in the media, at trade meetings and by the use of posters, leaflets and other publicity material.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many prosecutions have taken place since 1 January 1993 of people illegally importing and reselling alcoholic liquor in England and Wales; how many resulted in fines or imprisonment; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many prosecutions have taken place since 1 January 1993 of people illegally importing and reselling alcoholic liquor in Northern Ireland; how many resulted in fines or imprisonment; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: In England and Wales customs and Excise have successfully prosecuted 56 people since 1 January 1993 for illegally importing and reselling alcoholic liquors in the United Kingdom. The courts awarded prison sentences against two people and fines of up to £8,000 against 43 people.

No prosecutions have yet been brought in Northern Ireland.

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received to date about the importation of cheap alcoholic drinks from the continent; and what replies he has sent.

Sir John Cope: I have received a number of representations on this subject. The replies I have sent have answered the questions raised, offered clarification of the issues involved and set out the Government's position, as appropriate.

Civil Servants

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants are now employed; and how many civil servants were employed immediately prior to the process of market testing.

Mr. Dorrell: On 1 October 1993 there were 546,339 permanent civil servants, the lowest in the post-war period. Final figures for 1 April 1994 are not yet available, but these are expected to show a further decline to about 535,000. On 1 October 1991, immediately prior to the announcement of the introduction of market testing in November 1991, there were 560,903 permanent civil servants.

Taxation

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average tax rate including local and central Government income tax and social security payments, as a percentage of the gross income of a married man with two children earning (a) £20,000 a year and (b) £40,000 a year in (i) the United Kingdom, (ii) France, (iii) Germany, (iv) the United States of America and (v) Japan in 1993; and what he estimates will be the percentage figures for the same persons in the United Kingdom in the fiscal year 1995-96 based on Government tax policies already announced.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 29 March 1994]: The table gives the information requested.

International comparisons of this nature can be misleading because the rules of the tax and social security systems, and the level of provision of public services, vary widely. For example, in Germany, people with the levels of income shown would be above the threshold where they cease to be liable to make contributions for sickness and they would have to make private provision. The comparison also takes no account of indirect taxes. The table includes employers' social security contributions. This gives a more complete picture, as both the employer's and employee's contributions are likely to affect take-home pay.

Figures for the United Kingdom for 1995-96 will depend on changes in earnings and prices and the value of allowances.

	*Proportion of income paid in income tax and social security contributions		*Marginal rates of income tax and social security contributions
	£20,000 gross earnings	£40,000 gross earnings	£20,000 gross earnings	£40,000 gross earnings
France[1,2]
Income tax and social security contributions	46·6	49·9	51·4	69·1
United Kingdom[2,3]
Income tax and social security contributions	31·6	38·1	44·4	50·4
Japan[4]
Income tax and social security contributions	29·5	45·1	41·7	63·8
Germany[1,2,5]
Income tax and social security contributions	29·1	34·0	48·1	33·3
United States of America[1,6]
Income tax and social security contributions	23·7	31·0	34·30	38·90

*Includes both employees' and employers' contributions.

[1] Figures for 1993. Earnings converted into local currencies using purchasing power parities.

[2] No local income taxes.

[3] Income tax plus national insurance contributions less child benefit expressed as a percentage of earnings. The married man is assumed to be in receipt of the full married couple's allowance.

[4] Local taxes at the standard rate.

[5] Excluding those social security contributions for employees with earnings above the insurable ceilings.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Abattoirs

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make it her policy, after the formation of the meat hygiene service, to make representations for British meat inspectors to have equivalent status to French and Dutch veterinary technicians for the purposes of relevant European legislation on abattoirs.

Mr. Soames: The meat hygiene service is committed to delivering a cost-effective and consistent meat inspection service and, to do so, will seek to maximise the role of qualified meat inspectors in slaughterhouses within the requirements of the legislation.

The EC has harmonised rules on the training of veterinarians and mutual recognition of veterinary qualifications, but has never harmonised the training and qualifications of technicians—termed "auxiliaries" in the directives. If the chief executive of the meat hygiene service, in the light of operating experience, considers such EC harmonisation would facilitate the achievement of the MHS objectives we will explore the possibilities with the Commission and other member states.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she is taking to encourage and promote the establishment of more small abattoirs.

Mr. Soames: The Government have always recognised the importance of small abattoirs and have taken a number of steps to ensure that the single market rules are applied sensibly and flexibly. We negotiated in the EC fresh meat directive less onerous structural requirements for low-throughput abattoirs and were instrumental in increasing the original throughput limit of 12 livestock units per week to 20 until 31 December 1994. We will press for this limit to be made permanent in the Commission's review of the impact of the Directive on small businesses. In mid-1993, we introduced an upper limit on local authority charges for meat inspection, which provides assurances to small abattoirs about the maximum level of charges they may face. Together, these measures will create a stable situation within which new small abattoirs can be established if there is a market opportunity for them.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment she has made of the difference in average attendance fees being paid by small abattoirs to (a) veterinary surgeons and (b) environmental health officers.

Mr. Soames: Official veterinary surgeons and meat inspectors or environmental health officers are employed for meat inspection duties by local authorities which recover the costs from abattoirs, subject to a maximum of £40 for the first four livestock units and £6·30 for each additional livestock unit. The maximum charge of £40 was based on £28 for veterinary attendance, being the average turnout fee paid to local veterinary inspectors in 1991, and £12 for the meat inspector's duties.

Fish Landings

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is her estimate for the last 12 months of the landing of unlogged fish around the coast of the United Kingdom; what percentage of total landings this represents; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The landing of unlogged fish is an illegal activity and it is not possible to make a meaningful estimate of the extent to which it occurs. Illegal landings jeopardise the livelihoods of fishermen and those dependent on the industry and undermine the efforts that are being made to conserve stocks. The United Kingdom fisheries inspectorate devotes substantial resources to detecting and preventing unlogged landings of fish and appropriate enforcement action is taken where there is firm evidence of illegal landings occurring.

Sheep Dips

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will amend the regulations governing certificates for the purchase of organophosphorus dips by restricting the use as well as purchase of such dips to certificate holders.

Mr. Soames: I have no plans to do so. The existing controls are effective as they stand, and prevent those purchasing organophosphorus dips from selling or supplying them on to others. The Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations also already require those working with dips to be adequately trained. Possession of a certificate will be taken into account by HSE inspectors when assessing how this requirement has been met.

Spanish Fishing Vessels

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is her policy to rely upon relative stability, according to its recognised definition, to keep Spanish registered fishing vessels, or fishing vessels owned by Spanish citizens out of all parts of the North sea.

Mr. Jack: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 13 April to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), Official Report, column 183-84.

Nuts (Allergies)

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures she is taking to encourage the clearer labelling of food stuffs in order to eliminate risks to people who are allergic to nuts.

Mr. Soames: Labelling is only really effective with pre-packaged foodstuffs and we have encouraged manufacturers and retailers to indicate the presence of nuts or peanuts in a foodstuff on a voluntary basis where the EC labelling rules do not provide for it. In the much larger area of food purchased through catering outlets where the problems for people who suffer from this allergy occur, we have alerted operators to the serious nature of the allergy and to the need to have available reliable information on recipes so as to answer accurately questions from sufferers. I am pleased to say that on all fronts we have had a positive response.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Local Authority Museums

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to increase assistance to museums run by local authorities containing collections of national significance.

Mr. Sproat: There are many museum collections of national significance, a large number run by local authorities. In his announcement on 11 May, Official Report, column 172, my right hon. Friend advised the House that he was about to undertake a review of the Department's policy towards museums and galleries. That is now under way: we welcome comments from anyone who wishes to offer them, but it would not be right for me to anticipate the outcome of the review.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has concerning local authority museums selling all or part of their collections due to financial constraints in the years 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: There are a number of reasons why museums, including those run by local authorities, might dispose of items in their collections. However, systematic data on such disposals, and the reasons for them, are not collected by my Department.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which museum collections owned by local authorities attract central Government grant assistance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: Local authorities and their museums attract grant assistance from Government Departments in a wide variety of ways and for differing purposes. It is not possible to provide comprehensive details of such assistance across the museum field. While my own Department does not offer specific assistance to local authority museums, it does provide funding to bodies such as the National Heritage Memorial Fund and the Museums and Galleries Comission, which provides grants and other support to a wide range of museums and galleries; similarly, my Department participates in the museums and galleries improvement fund, a joint initiative with the Wolfson Foundation and Family Charitable Trust.

British Road Transport Museums

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what direct assistance his Department give towards the costs of the British road transport museum in Coventry.

Mr. Sproat: I understand that the museum of British road transport in Coventry has been helped in a number of ways by the west midlands area museum service, which receives funding from the Museums and Galleries Commission. It has also received assistance towards acquisitions from the National Heritage Memorial Fund and from the PRISM fund for preservation of industrial and scientific material which is administered by the National museum of science and industry on behalf of the Museums and Galleries Commission.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the most significant collections in the United Kingdom road transport heritage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: There are a number of museums in the United Kingdom with significant road transport material in their collections. They are important in different ways and it is not possible to specify which is the most significant.

Indemnity Undertakings

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many indemnity undertakings were given by Departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six-month period ended 31 March 1994; and what was the value of contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time and remaining outstanding as at 31 March 1994.

Mr. Brooke: In the six-month period ended 31 March 1994 the following undertakings to indemnify were given by the relevant Departments for items on loan to national and non-national institutions:

	Number
Department of National Heritage	437
Scottish Office Education Department	43
Welsh Office Education Department	32
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	14

The value of contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time and outstanding at 31 March 1994 are:

Department of National Heritage	1,844,520,914
Scottish Office Education Department	106,369,193
Welsh Office Education Department	41,061,343
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	9,268,944

Royal Palaces

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what accommodation is available at Buckingham palace for the use of the Duke of York.

Mr. Sproat: His Royal Highness the Duke of York has use of two bedrooms, a dressing room, a sitting room, a dining room and two bathrooms at Buckingham palace. These rooms do not form a self-contained apartment.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what are the reasons for making grace-and-favour accommodation available at the historic royal palaces; and who occupies it.

Mr. Sproat: About half the units of grace-and-favour accommodation at the historic royal palaces have been made available to pensioners who were former employees of Her Majesty the Queen, and the remainder to employees or holders of positions in the royal household whose duties require their attendance at Hampton Court or the Tower of London.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage on what basis rent is assessed for Prince Michael of Kent.

Mr. Sproat: The rent is assessed on a basis which takes into account the fact that His Royal Highness the Prince Michael of Kent is a more immediate member of the Royal Family who undertakes some official engagements on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen.

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what amount was taken in revenue from entry charges and merchandising by the Historic Royal Palaces Agency in the last financial year; and what is the target for next year.

Mr. Sproat: The provisional outturn figures for income from entry charges and shops in 1993-94 are £14·035 million and £4·934 million respectively, totalling £18·969 million.

For 1994-95, the corresponding targets set for the agency by the chief executive are £17·678 million and £5·463 million, totalling £23·141 million.

Museums

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what was the staffing level for the science museum library at the south Kensington site in May 1992; what it is now; and what is the projected site level for May 1995;

(2) what is the present salary of the director of the science museum;

(3) for what reasons Mr. Andrew Dow was removed from his appointment as curator of the national railway museum; whether the approval of a full meeting of the trustees was obtained before the removal of Mr. Dow; and what payment was made to Mr. Dow following his removal.

Mr. Sproat: These matters fall within the statutory responsibility of the trustees of the National museum of science and industry as set out by the National Heritage Act 1983.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Sproat: No civil servants within the Department of National Heritage are taking legal action against the Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many missions have been conducted by the United Nations Special Commission on Iraq to inspect military and nuclear sites; and if he will arrange for copies of all reports of UNSCOM visits to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There have been 74 UNSCOM/IAEA missions to Iraq. The 75th is at present in Iraq. UNSCOM inspection reports are not published but a description of missions is given in the six-monthly reports issued by the Secretary-General of the UN. The latest of these are Security Council documents S/1994/489 and S/1994/490 for UNSCOM and the IAEA respectively. In addition the IAEA submits more detailed inspection reports to the UN Secretary-General which are circulated as UN documents. The latest of these are S/1994/31, on the 22nd IAEA mission, and S/1994/355, on the 23rd mission. All these documents are available in the Library of the House.

Korea

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, during his recent meeting with his South Korean counterpart, he discussed the use by North Korea of blueprints of the British Magnox reactor design to construct its plutonium production reactors currently under inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We do not know whether North Korea has drawn on plans of British reactors in the production of its own reactors. North Korea possesses a graphite moderated reactor which, while much smaller, has generic similarities to the reactors operated by British Nuclear Fuels plc. However, design information of these British reactors is not classified and has appeared in technical journals.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs did not discuss this matter with the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Korea during their recent meeting.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the International Atomic Energy Agency nuclear safeguards inspection visit to the North Korean nuclear facilities on 18 May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The full outcome of the latest visit of an International Atomic Energy Agency inspection team to North Korea will not be known until after their return to Vienna. However, the IAEA Director-General, Dr. Blix, reported to the United Nations Security Council on 20 May that the inspectors had been allowed to perform outstanding safeguards activities at the radiochemical laboratory. He also confirmed that North Korea had begun discharging fuel from the core of its 5MW reactor, in violation of its safeguards agreement.

EU Foreign Affairs Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Foreign Affairs Council on 16 and 17 May.

Mr. Hurd: I attended the Foreign Affairs Council on 16-17 May.

The Council took the formal decision—by unanimity—to admit Norway, Austria, Finland and Sweden to the Union. The treaty of accession will now be signed at the European Council on 24 June.

President Delors presented a short paper describing progress on the follow-up to the White Paper on Growth, Competitiveness and Employment. He noted that recent economic news in the Community was encouraging; drew attention to efforts to improve the functioning of the internal market; highlighted progress on identifying priority transEuropean network projects; and noted that work was continuing on the audit of selected pieces of legislation for their effects on employment.

In the discussion that followed, I and others emphasised the importance of deregulation and of completing the single market, especially in areas such as transport, energy and telecommunications.

The Council reviewed progress in the negotiations towards a partnership and co-operation agreement with Russia.

The Council agreed that the EU's partnership and co-operation agreement with Ukraine would be signed in June, and had a first discussion of Commission proposals on further ways to enhance the EU/Ukraine relationship.

The Council agreed unanimously a Commission proposal to resolve a dispute between the EC and Chile over Chilean apple exports to the EC.

The Council considered a Commission report on relations with Switzerland. It asked the Commission to bring forward as soon as possible mandates for negotiations on research, free movement of people, trade in agricultural goods, public procurement and technical barriers to trade. On transport, the Council asked the Commission to seek urgent clarification from the Swiss on how the Swiss people's recent vote to ban the transit of heavy goods vehicles would be implemented.

The Council discussed recent developments in the peace negotiations on former Yugoslavia. It agreed unanimously to extend the joint action on humanitarian aid to Bosnia and to apply part of the resources for this to the EU administration in Mostar. The Council had a short discussion of the situation in Algeria and the possibilities for Community assistance. It issued the statement on Rwanda which appears at the end of this answer. The Commission also indicated that it would shortly propose an interim agreement between the EU and South Africa.

The Council adopted by concensus a code of conduct for continuing multilateral negotiations on trade in certain service sectors, where agreement could not be reached by the conclusion of the Uruguay round. This will enable the Community to participate effectively in the continuing GATT negotiations on services.

The Council agreed the draft conclusions for the launch conference of the stability pact in Paris on 26-27 May and discussed prospects for the conference.

The Council discussed a compromise text aimed at unblocking the negotiations on an energy charter treaty.

At the request of the Danish Government, the Council discussed the operation of its openness policy. It asked officials to consider whether existing procedures for handling applications for documents needed amending, and to make recommendations to the Council. The Council agreed to reject the application by the Guardian newspaper for a number of Council documents. Denmark and the Netherlands voted against.

The Secretary General of the Council urged member states to take a flexible approach on the protection of classified information under titles V and VI of the Maastricht treaty. The Council referred the matter to COREPER.

The Council agreed that informal contacts with the European Parliament on titles V and VI should continue, but that decisions would have to await the election of the new Parliament.

A co-operation council with Egypt and the first meeting of the European Economic Area Agreement Council took place in the margins.

DECLARATION BY THE EUROPEAN UNION ON RWANDA

The European Union, recalling its declaration of 18 April 1994 on Rwanda, again appeals urgently to all parties to the conflict to bring an end to the genocide now taking place in the country.

The European Union expresses its full support for the United Nations' humanitarian efforts and in this context welcomes the resolution that is currently before the Security Council. The European Union looks forward to an urgent decision on measures which can be implemented soon.

The European Union welcomes the initiative of the United Nations High Commissioner on Human Rights to conduct a mission on both Rwanda and Burundi and supports the call for a special meeting of the UN Commission on Human Rights.

The European Union expresses its appreciation and support for the efforts of the OAU and to President Mwinyi of Tanzania for their initiatives in convening a regional conference, in which both the authorities of Rwanda and the RPF will be invited.

The European Union urges the two sides to agree on the need to respect the Arusha agreement, which, through the way of negotiation, offers the best available basis for national reconciliation. In this context the European Union supports the call for an early imposition of an arms embargo on Rwanda, and calls on all concerned to refrain from any action that is liable to exacerbate the situation.

The European Union is eager to increase its humanitarian aid whenever and where such aid can be brought to the populations that have suffered so cruelly from the violence. In this respect it will continue its immediate assistance to refugees in the neighbouring countries and will endeavour to equally assist the stricken populations within Rwanda, whenever conditions allow this.

Kanwar Singh Dhami

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the arrest of Kanwar Singh Dhami, president of the Akal Federation, in Chandigarh, Punjab; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We understand that Mr. Dhami's case is before the courts and that his lawyers have regular access to him. Her Majesty's high commission in New Delhi have spoken to his lawyers in Punjab. They confirmed that he is in good health and has not been maltreated.

Punjab

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence he has of individuals being tortured whilst under unlawful detention in Punjab; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We receive regular information from Her Majesty's high commission in New Delhi about allegations of torture and unlawful detention in Punjab. Although the situation has improved in the last year, we remain concerned that abuses continue to take place.

South Africa

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to hold discussions with the British groups of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and the Inter-Parliamentary Union in order to develop programmes and to invite members of the new South African Parliament to visit

London and take part in such programmes of political development within their country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We attach importance to establishing close operational links with members of the new South African Parliament and will take every opportunity to do so.

To this end my noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey will shortly hold a meeting with several hon. Members and noble Lords who have a close interest in South Africa, including many who were election observers under the auspices of the IPU and CPA, to discuss how to take forward this initiative.

Mr. Edward Roberts

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what record the Minister for Overseas Development has of receiving a recorded delivery letter from Mr. Edward Roberts of 28 Dulverton road, Liverpool 17, concerning his experiences as a prisoner-of-war at Drancy.

Mr. Lennox Boyd: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), wrote to the hon. Member on this matter on 20 May.

Nigeria

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he made of the likely use to which the 21 battle tanks sold to Nigeria in 1993 will be put prior to agreeing to the sale.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We considered this export licence application carefully, in the light of our usual criteria, including the international guidelines to which we are committed. We were satisfied that the equipment in question would be used to fulfil Nigeria's legitimate defence needs.

Malawi

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the recent elections in Malawi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government welcome the peaceful transition to multi-party democracy in Malawi brought about by these elections, which both the joint international observer group and the Malawi electoral commission declared free and fair.

We commend the ready acceptance of the results by all sides in Malawi and in particular former-President Banda's call for all political parties to co-operate in building a better Malawi.

We look forward to working closely with the new Government and with President Muluzi. The Permanent Secretary at the ODA is visiting Malawi from 31 May to 2 June. The new Government face many challenges including a serious crop failure. We plan to offer an additional £3 million in balance of payments support for 1994-95, and 10,000 tonnes of food aid to help them overcome it and keep to their economic reform programme.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 31 March, Official Report, column 1025, if he will give the percentage of cases cleared by individual Child Support Agency centres during each quarter of 1993-94 in (a) under 40 days, (b) between 40 and 100 days and (c) over 100 days; and when he expects to be able to provide detailed information as to the average time taken for each stage of the assessment process.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member shortly.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 25 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking about clearance times for the maintenance application process.

Figures for the first two quarters covering the period 5 April to 30 September 1993 are not available. Figures for the third and fourth quarters are shown in the attached annex.

Information on the time taken to deal with maintenance application and enquiry forms is currently being validated and should be available shortly.

In my earlier reply of 31 March 1994, I said that the figures quoted were year to date figures from 5 April 1993. I have since established that they were year to date figures from 1 October 1993 as figures prior to that date are not available. Please accept my apologies for this mistake.

The answer also corrects information given to the honourable member for Glasgow Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on 18 February 1994 at Col 1023, and the honourable member for Dunfermline West (Ms Squire) on 8 March 1994 at Cols 215-216.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what figures are available to show waiting times between the parent with care contacting the Child Support Agency and an initial maintenance inquiry form being dispatched.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 25 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the time taken between a parent with care contacting the Agency and a maintenance enquiry form being issued to the absent parent.

Contact between a parent with care and the Agency normally begins when the Agency issues a maintenance application form to the parent with care. In a small proportion of cases, however, the parent with care may contact the Agency to request such a form.

Information on the time taken to deal with maintenance application forms, measured from the date on which the form is issued to the date on which processing of the form is completed, is currently being validated and should be available shortly.

I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Child Support Agency contacts the parent with care in all cases where a delay occurs in obtaining information from the absent parent, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 25 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about contact with parents with care when there is a delay in obtaining information from the absent parent.

If an absent parent fails to return the Maintenance Enquiry Form (MEF) the Agnecy will issue a letter warning that an Interim Maintenance Assessment (IMA), which is generally higher than a full maintenance assessment, will be considered if information requested is not received within 14 days of receipt. At the same time the parent with care is notified that this warning letter has been issued.

If an absent parent does return the MEF but fails to provide all of the information required, then the Agency will still consider imposing an IMA. In such cases a warning letter will be sent to the absent parent and the parent with care will be notified at the same time.

If no response is received at this stage and an IMA is to be imposed, both the absent parent and the parent with care will receive a letter setting out the amount of the IMA and the date from which it will be imposed.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he will take to reduce the number of weeks which the Child Support Agency requires to process maintenance assessments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 25 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the time taken by the Agency to process maintenance assessments.

The Agency originally expected to take 6 to 12 weeks to clear a straightforward case once fully operational. The aim of clearing such cases within that time scale was first expressed before the Agency had experience of live operation. In practice, the assessment process has turned out to be more complex and clearance times longer than was originally expected.

The maintenance formula which is used in making the assessment is detailed as it has to take account of the individual circumstances of both parents. A great deal of information is required to ensure the assessment is realistic, and accurately reflects their circumstances. It is inevitable therefore that the entire process will take time.

At this stage it is still too early to predict what clearance times will be achieved in the longer term, although the Agency is working hard to ensure that all applications for maintenance are cleared as quickly as possible.

I can reassure you that the Agency is constantly reviewing all aspects of its operations to ensure that the most effective means of handling cases are identified and changes made where the process can be improved.

I hope you find this helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what time limit has been established for an interim award of maintenance to the parent with care from the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 25 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the time limit for an interim award of maintenance to a parent with care.

When Maintenance Enquiry Forms (MEFs) are issued, absent parents are advised that they must be completed and returned within 14 days of issue. If, after 14 days the absent parent fails to return the MEF, a letter is issued to advise him or her than an Interim Maintenance Assessment (IMA) will be considered if the information required is not received within 14 days.

If a MEF has still not been return 28 days after it has been issued, the child support officer will consider whether an IMA is appropriate. Once the child support officer decides an IMA is appropriate, it will be imposed within 9 days. If an IMA is considered not to be appropriate at this stage, the case may be referred for an interview locally with the absent parent to resolve the matter. All cases will be followed up subsequently and a decision made in the light of all the circumstances.

In all cases, our aim is to make a decision as soon as the information is available.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence is available to identify any transfer of care from one parent to the other resulting from assessment by the Child Support Agency; and what studies have been undertaken on this.

Mr. Burt: Matters relating to the care and residence of a child are principally matters for the court. The Department has not undertaken any studies on this issue.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to link the pay of the chief executive of the Child Support Agency to the time taken to send replies to letters and to the extent to which those replies answer the questions asked; and if he will give reasons for his decision.

Mr. Burt: The Child Support Agency chief executive's entitlement to a performance bonus is largely determined by the achievement of the published key performance targets for the agency taken as a package. Details of the key targets for 1994-95 have not yet been decided. They will be published in the agency's business plan, a copy of which will be available in the Library.

Cold Weather Payments

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish details of those boundaries between areas linked to different weather stations for the purposes of the cold weather payments scheme which follow the line of a road in a built-up area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Scott: There are currently 49 cases of serving or ex-officers of the Department who are pursuing legal action against the Department for alleged injury arising out of work-related upper limb disorders.

Pensioners Benefits

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the total sum of benefits deducted from pensioners as a result of periods in hospitals as in-patients in each year since 1979.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available.

Maxwell Pension Fund

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government will respond to the second report of the Social Security Committee on the work of the Maxwell Pension Fund trustees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: The Government's response to the Select Committee's report is published today. We welcome the Committee's continued interest in the process for recovering assets missing from the Maxwell pension funds.

The Government strongly support the initiative taken by the Maxwell Pensioners Trust to promote an overall settlement to disputes relating to missing pension fund assets. We share the Committee's view that the initiative offers the best chance for resolution of the schemes' problems with minimum cost and delay.

The Government are currently considering the detailed recommendations of the Pension Law Review Committee, and will take the Select Committee's views into account when finalising its response.

Invalidity Benefits

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how the evaluation will be made as to whether a claimant is in the latter stages of multiple sclerosis in respect of eligibility for the incapacity benefit to be introduced in 1995;

(2) what role will be played by Benefits Agency adjudication officers in evaluating the claims made by sufferers of multiple sclerosis for invalidity benefit under the provisions he announced on 30 November;

(3) what representations she has received from the Multiple Sclerosis Society in regard to the effects on the eligibility of claimants for incapacity benefit of the legislation that comes into force in 1995.

Mr. Scott: I have been asked to reply.

All claims to incapacity benefit will be decided by Benefits Agency adjudication officers. The adjudication officer will have before him evidence provided by the claimant in the form of a questionnaire, a GP's diagnosis and statement of main disabling conditions, and a report from a departmental doctor providing advice on the level of functional limitation and any other evidence that the claimant and/or representative has provided.

We have developed a list of conditions which will exempt certain groups of claimants from the new test of incapacity. The list includes those claimants suffering with severe and progressive neurological or muscle-wasting diseases such as the latter stages of multiple sclerosis. In such claims no further inquiries will be made and the adjudication officer will determine that the person is incapable of work.

As part of the consultative process on the proposals for the new medical test, we have received representations from the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. We will take account of their comments in the further development of the test.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Social Services

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received concerning the establishment of an independent staff commission to review and monitor personnel procedures of the health and social services trusts in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Health and social services trusts are bound by the same employment legislation as other Northern Ireland employers. My noble Friend Baroness Denton has not received any representations concerning the establishment of a commission to monitor and review the personnel procedures of such trusts.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on liaison between the new health and social services trusts in Northern Ireland and (a) universities in Northern Ireland and (b) the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work, on the training of personnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: My noble Friend Baroness Denton is quite content that the existing liaison arrangements will continue to operate satisfactorily. Health and social services trusts are empowered to make facilities and staff available in connection with training by a university or any other body providing training in connection with the health and personal social services.

Trusts which provide a significant level of personal social services must appoint one executive director who holds a recognised qualification in social work.

Additionally, where a trust has a significant medical teaching commitment, the Department of Health and Social Services must appoint a non-executive director from the university with a medical or dental school specified in its establishment order.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 10 May, Official Report, column 126, what was the cost of calls made on portable telephones in 1993-94.

Sir John Wheeler: The cost of calls made on portable telephones for the 1993-94 financial year was £70,000.

Cairnshill Primary School

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when application was made for planning permission for temporary accommodation at Cairnshill primary school; what was the closing date for objections to this application; how many objections there were; whether this scheme for temporary accommodation has been approved by the Department of Education; what proposals there are to replace this temporary accommodation with permanent buildings; what is the estimated cost of this temporary accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The Department of the Environment received the application for planning permission on 21 April 1994; the closing date for representations was 13 May 1994 and six objections were received. The approval of the Department of Education is not required as this is a matter for the South-East education and library board; there are no plans at present to replace the proposed accommodation with permanent buildings; the estimated cost of the work is £160,000.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the enrolment for each of the past five years at Cairnshill primary school; and what is the projected enrolment for each of the next five years.

Mr. Ancram: The enrolments are as follows:

Year	Number
1989-90	353
1990-91	351
1991-92	383
1992-93	414
1993-94	430
1994-95	[1]454

[1] Estimated.

Projections of future enrolments are not available, but it is understood that the South-Eastern education and library board is currently carrying out a review of primary and secondary school provision in the area.

Meat Industry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the effect of the European Commission's de-seasonalisation scheme on the Northern Ireland beef industry; what effect this scheme will have on employment at dead meat plants; what proposals he intends to make to the European Commission; and if he will make a statement on the de-seasonalisation scheme.

Mr. Ancram: The objective of the scheme was to reduce the concentration of cattle slaughterings in the autumn. The premium was paid in Northern Ireland in 1993 and 1994 resulting in a significant switch of slaughterings from the autumn to late winter/early spring. Northern Ireland will not be a qualifying region for the premium in 1995. If, as a result, slaughterings return to the traditional pattern in autumn 1994, employment at meat plants is likely to alter accordingly with a return to greater use of seasonal staff to handle the increased throughput in the autumn. The European Commission is scheduled to review the operation of the scheme next year. It would not be appropriate to make any proposals to the Commission at this stage.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated number of cattle killed at meat plants in each of the past two years; how many cattle from Northern Ireland went to the Republic last year to be killed; what assessment he has made of the reasons for a movement of beef cattle, stores and calves from Northern Ireland to the Republic; what assessment he has made of the implications of such movement for the viability of Northern Ireland dead meat plants and employment; and if he will make a statement on his proposals to bring this movement of animals to an end.

Mr. Ancram: Cattle slaughterings in Northern Ireland totalled 498,565 in 1992 and 432,660 in 1993.

Because of BSE restrictions, the movement of cattle out of the United Kingdom is prohibited unless they are under six months of age or originated outside the United Kingdom. About 3,000 cattle are recorded as having been moved from Northern Ireland to the Republic of Ireland for slaughter last year as well as around 20,000 calves for onward shipment to other member states. There is no record of the movement of store cattle to the Republic of Ireland.

I am not aware that the movement of stock to the Republic of Ireland has had any serious effects on employment or the viability of meat plants in Northern Ireland and am not proposing any action to stop such cattle movements.

Carryduff, Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the police have investigated cases of (a) joy riding, (b) vandalism, (c) attacks on persons and (d) illegal drugs in Carryduff during the past six months; whether any persons were prosecuted for matters relating to these problems in Carryduff; whether the police had such matters directed to their attention; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Wheeler: These are operational matters which are the responsibility of the Chief Constable. However, I have been advised that there have been investigations into incidents involving stolen vehicles, vandalism and assault in the Carryduff area during the last six months. No persons have yet been charged and investigations are on-going.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many homes at Carryduff, Castlereagh, were let or re-let by the Housing Executive during the most recent 12 months for which figures are available; and how many of these homes were allocated to families from west Belfast.

Mr. Tim Smith: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; however, I am advised by its chief executive that from 1 May 1993 to 30 April 1994, there were 24 lettings/re-lettings of Housing Executive dwellings in the Carryduff area of Castlereagh. One of these was allocated to a family originally from West Belfast, but living in Lisburn in the five months immediately prior to the allocation.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent there has been an increase in incidents requiring police attention at Church road, Carryduff in the borough of Castlereagh; what proposals he has to increase police presence at Church road; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Wheeler: I am advised that there has been a limited increase in minor incidents in Church road, Carryduff.

The deployment of police is an operational matter for the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. However, the Chief Constable has advised me that additional constables have been appointed to the local neighbourhood unit at Carryduff.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of state for Northern Ireland to what extent there has been an increase in incidents requiring police attention at the Killynure Housing Executive estate in Carryduff in the borough of Castlereagh; what proposals he has to increase policing at this estate; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Wheeler: I am advised that there has been a limited increase in minor incidents at the Killynure housing estate, Carryduff.

The deployment of police is an operational matter for the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary who has advised me that additional constables have been appointed to the local neighbourhood unit at Carryduff.

Non-departmental Bodies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the non-departmental bodies in the Province the conduct of which can be referred to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

Sir John Wheeler: The offices of the Northern Ireland Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, commonly referred to as "the Ombudsman", are held by the same person. The function of the Northern Ireland Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration is to investigate complaints of alleged injustice as a consequence of maladministration by Northern Ireland Departments, including their agencies, while the function of the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints is to investigate similar complaints against local and public bodies. The list of non-departmental bodies which are subject to the jurisdiction of the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints is as follows:—

Local bodies

Local Authorities (ie District Councils)
Any new town commission established under the New Towns Acts (Northern Ireland) 1965 to 1968 and any committee or sub-committee thereof.
Harbour Authorities.

Public Bodies

Agricultural Marketing Boards
Agricultural Research Institute of Northern Ireland
Arts Council for Northern Ireland
Council for Catholic Maintained Schools
Education and Library Boards
Enterprise Ulster
Fire Authority for Northern Ireland
Fisheries Conservancy Board for Northern Ireland
Health and Social Services Boards
Health and Social Services Trusts
Industrial Training Boards
Labour Relations Agency
Laganside Corporation
Livestock Marketing Commission for Northern Ireland
Local Enterprise Development Unit
Mental Health Commission for Northern Ireland
National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Northern Ireland
Northern Ireland Central Services Agency for the Health and Social Services
Northern Ireland Housing Executive
Northern Ireland Local Government Officers' Superannuation Committee
Northern Ireland Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment
Northern Ireland Sports Council
Northern Ireland Tourist Board
Special Health and Social Services Agencies
Trustees of the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum
Trustees of the Ulster Museum
Youth Council for Northern Ireland
Office of the Northern Ireland Commission for the Rights of Trade Union Members

Housing Policy Advisory Group

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the members of the advisory group, including their occupations, established to undertake a review of Government housing policy in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tim Smith: The membership of the advisory group is as follows:

Chairman:	N. Hamilton	Under Secretary, Department of the Environment
Members:	W. V. Blease	Chief Executive, Northern Ireland Housing Executive
	E. Holmes	Director, Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations
	W. A. Doran	Deputy Director, Construction Employers' Federation
	Mrs. J. McCrum	Ex Director, Housing Rights Service
	D. J. A. Young	Chairman, Building Societies Association
	Ms C. Laird	Institute of Housing
	R. Best	Joseph Rowntree Foundation
	Prof. A. Murie	Heriot Watt University
	P. Sweeney	Northern Ireland Voluntary Trust
	R. J. Polley	Rent Officer for Northern Ireland
	Ms P. Bowen	Tenants Representative

Toll Roads

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what study his Department has made relating to the introduction of toll roads in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tim Smith: With the enactment of the necessary enabling legislation earlier this year, the Department of the Environment is in a position to introduce toll roads and will be prepared to consider suitable proposals.

Training Schemes

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many students, in each of the last two years, at each Government training centre in Northern Ireland received a placement with an employer prior to completing national vocational qualification level 2 examinations;

(2) how many students have left each Government training centre in Northern Ireland in each of the last two years without sitting national vocational qualifications level 2 examinations.

Mr. Tim Smith: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. J. S. Crozier. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. S. Crozier to Mr. Roy Beggs, dated 24 May 1994:

You have asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students, in each of the last two years at each Government Training Centre in Northern Ireland received a placement with an employer prior to completing NVQ Level II examinations. You also asked how many students have left each Government Training Centre in Northern Ireland in each of the last two years without sitting NVQ Level II.

The Secretary of State has asked me, as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency and therefore responsible for the operation of Training Centres to reply.

I should first explain that the general objective for trainees in Training Centres is that they should achieve qualifications at NVQ Level III. The normal procedure is that trainees spend a year in a Training Centre followed by a period of work placement and training with an employer of such duration as is necessary to enable the qualification to be secured. Since the Level III qualification is only achieved on the completion of the full programme, until recently trainees in general had no qualification as such on leaving the Training Centre after their first year.

In 1992/93 changes were introduced with the objective of enabling all trainees to achieve a Level II qualification on leaving the Centre before being placed with an employer on their way to Level III. However the unavailability of documentation at that time from Awarding Bodies made it necessary in many cases to place trainees in their employment placement and then to ask them to return to Training Centres to complete their NVQ Level II assessments as required.

The 1992/93 intake of trainees left Training Centres during 1993/94. Approximately 50% of leavers during 1993-94 were placed with an employer prior to completing all of the requirements of NVQ Level II. In total however including those who returned to Training Centres to complete their qualifications,. 74% achieved the Level II qualification. I regret that I do not have readily available in meaningful form figures showing precisely how many students left each Centre without assessment for NVQ Level II or who received a placement with an employer prior to completing NVQ Level II assessment. However I append a breakdown for each Centre showing the percentage of the 1992-93 intake which achieved a Level II qualification.

Figures are not yet available for the 1993-94 intake since the trainees recruited in that year have not yet left their respective Centres. It is expected however that 90% of those who finish their first year in 1994 will have achieved NVQ Level II before being placed with an employer.

Self-employment

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland are self-employed.

Mr. Tim Smith: At June 1993, the latest date for which information is available, there were an estimated 74,500 self-employed persons in Northern Ireland.

Company Sizes

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies in Northern Ireland employ (a) fewer than 50 people and (b) more than 500 people.

Mr. Tim Smith: There are approximately 21,000 non-agricultural enterprises in the private sector in Northern Ireland employing fewer than 50 employees and 55 enterprises with more than 500 employees.

IRA Interviews

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many orders under schedule 7 to the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 have been served on journalists of Republican News or An Phoblacht in respect of interviews with members of the Irish Republican Army.

Sir John Wheeler: None.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Sir John Wheeler: The present number of civil servants taking legal action against the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments as a result of work-related upper limb disorders is eight.

Birth Control and Abortion

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has studied the results of the survey on attitudes to birth control and abortion carried out by Ulster Marketing Surveys, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: I am aware of the results of the opinion polls carried out in 1992 and 1993. Ministers welcomed these surveys as a useful contribution to informing debate within Northern Ireland on these topics.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to extend the Abortion Act 1967 to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: None. The Government have consistently held to the view that legislation should not be introduced to reform Northern Ireland abortion laws unless this is likely to command broad support within the Province. While concluding that such support did not exist, the Government have in the past undertaken to keep the matter under review and to be prepared to modify their policy to take account of any significant shift in public opinion which may occur.

Running Cost Limits

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the 1994-95 running cost limits for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments.

Sir John Wheeler: The gross running costs limit for 1994-95 for the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments is £787,031,000. There is also a net running cost limit for the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency. Details of the provision for individual Northern Ireland Departments are set out in the Northern Ireland Estimates which were laid before the House today.

Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will place in the Library the review prepared by the Chief Constable of the RUC under section 31 of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989.

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 23 May 1994]: No. There is no obligation under the Fair Employment (National Insurance) Act 1989 to make reviews under section 31 available to any person or organisation. I understand that the review prepared by the Chief Constable in fulfilment of the requirements of the Act, as an internal document, contains information which could prejudice the security of individual police officers. It is not appropriate that it be made public, but I understand that the Chief Constable has made it available to the Fair Employment Commission. It is the policy of the RUC that no member or job applicant receive less favourable treatment on the grounds of sex, marital status, religion or political opinion.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

16. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about current levels of local government expenditure in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: An analysis of the 1994-95 budget estimates of all Scottish local authorities has recently been completed and I am pleased to say that all authorities have budgeted at or below the expenditure limits implied by the provisional capping principles which my right hon. Friend announced on 30 November 1993. In those circumstances, my right hon. Friend does not propose to take capping action against any Scottish local authority this year.

Full Employment Programme

17. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to establish a new full employment programme for Scotland.

Mr. Lang: I have given priority to measures which create an environment in which companies will create new jobs and I am encouraged by the fall in seasonally adjusted unemployment in Scotland in eight of the last nine months.

Trades Union Congress

18. Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss the economy and employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My ministerial colleagues and I have frequent contacts with the STUC on matters concerning the Scottish economy. We look forward to a continuing exchange of views.

Geriatric Beds

19. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of (a) geriatric and (b) psychogeriatric beds in national health service hospitals in Scotland on the most recent available date; and what were the equivalent numbers for the same date three years previously.

Mr. Stewart: In December 1990 there were 11,341 geriatric assessment and long-stay beds in the NHS in Scotland. At December 1993 there were 10,433 beds. Over the same period the number of psychogeriatric beds increased from 5,875 to 6,036.

Ambulance Service

21. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the general manager of the Scottish ambulance service to discuss its future.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no recent discussions with the general manager regarding the future of the Scottish Ambulance Service. The chief executive of the management executive of the NHS in Scotland visited the headquarters of the Scottish Ambulance Service on 25 April and he met the general manager of the Scottish Ambulance Service on Friday 13 May. The future of the Scottish Ambulance Service was discussed on both occasions.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the minimum qualifications for a driver of an accident and emergency ambulance; and whether exceptions among such post holders have been drawn to his attention.

Mr. Stewart: All recruits to the Scottish Ambulance Service must have a clean driving record with a minimum of two years' experience.

Since 1981 new accident and emergency staff have been required to complete a two-week roadcraft driving course. In those rural areas where contractors or ambulance auxiliaries are used as drivers an assessment is made of their driving standards by a qualified ambulance service driving instructor and training is given as appropriate.

The Scottish Ambulance Service management has a protocol that in exceptional circumstances non-emergency staff may drive an accident and emergency vehicle.

No other exceptions have been drawn to the attention of my noble and learned Friend.

37. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the prospect of awarding trust status to the Scottish Ambulance Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend is aware of an early-day motion on 5 May about trust status for the Scottish Ambulance Service but has not received any other representations. The trust application is out for public consultation and all comments received will be carefully considered before a decision is made.

Quangos

22. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people currently serving on quangos in Scotland are appointed by him; and how many further appointments would be required if the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill were to be implemented.

Mr. Lang: The number of people serving on bodies sponsored by my Department and appointed by the Secretary of State for Scotland, as at 1 September 1993, was 1,472. This excludes children's panel members. The Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill makes provision for the establishment of a number of public bodies and the abolition of a number of others—such as the Scottish Valuation Advisory Council and many area tourist boards. It is too early to say what the overall effect will be.

Local Government Reorganisation

23. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has recently had with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss the proposed changes to local government in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend last met the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 28 January 1994. The Convention did not raise any issues relating to local government reform at that meeting.

24. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss local government reform; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I are scheduled to meet the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 22 July as part of the normal consultation on local government finance matters. It is likely that local government reform will be discussed at that meeting.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the names and locations of schools which would have catchment areas crossing the local education authority boundaries proposed in the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill; and how many pupils will be affected in each case.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Comprehensive information on school catchment areas is not held centrally within the Scottish Office. I cannot therefore add to what I said to the hon. Member during the debate on the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Bill on 18 May. Catchment areas are in any case unaffected by the proposed changes in local government boundaries and catchment areas at the time of local government reorganisation would remain in place unless and until the new authorities seek to change them.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of savings on staff costs through local government reorganisation; and how this was calculated.

Mr. Stewart: The Government estimate that a 32 unitary authority structure of local government will save up to £52 million per year in staff costs. The savings are calculated to accrue from a reduction in the number of local authority posts of up to 1,800.

38. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further representations he has received on his proposals for local government.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend continues to receive a range of representations about the Government's proposals for local government reform in Scotland. Since January I have also met 25 hon. Members who accompanied delegations to discuss the new structure.

Training

25. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Scottish Enterprise Network to discuss the current level of provision for training in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend met the chairman and chief executive of Scottish Enterprise at the local enterprise company conference on 25 March 1994 when a range of issues, including training, was discussed.

33. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met Scottish Enterprise to discuss training for young people.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend met the chairman and chief executive of Scottish Enterprise at the local enterprise company conference on 25 March 1994 when a range of issues, including training for young people, was discussed.

Environmental Protection Agency

26. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will reconsider the Government's current proposals to introduce legislation to create a Scottish environmental protection agency; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: We remain committed to the establishment of the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, and legislation will be introduced shortly to enable detailed planning to proceed.

Sport and Recreation

27. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will introduce measures to improve sport and recreational facilities in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: The provision of sport and recreational facilities is primarily for local authorities to determine. The Scottish Sports Council, funded by Government and which provides national specialist sports facilities at Inverclyde, Cumbrae and Glenmore Lodge, offers an expert advisory service to local authorities for new development in sport facilities. The national lottery will offer exciting opportunities for further improvement of sport and recreational facilities throughout Scotland.

Forestry Commission

28. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to make the Forestry Commission a "next steps" agency.

Mr. Lang: My fellow forestry Ministers and I are currently considering the report of the forestry review group which was asked to review, among other things, the options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands. An announcement about our conclusions will be made in due course.

Health Service

29. Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Scottish health service.

Mr. Stewart: The NHS in Scotland is treating a record number of patients, is progressively reducing the amount of time people wait for treatment, is providing more information and more choice to patients, and is funded at record levels.

Manufacturing

30. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement on productivity in manufacturing.

Mr. Stewart: Manufacturing productivity in Scotland —defined as output per person employed—is at an all-time high.

It is estimated that Scotland's productivity growth in the 1980s was above that in any of the G7 economies. This impressive performance was maintained in 1993, when output per person employed was 5·1 per cent. higher than in 1992.

Sports Funding

31. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when next he intends to meet the chairman of the Scottish Sports Council to discuss funding of sport in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: I met the chairman of the Scottish Sports Council as recently as 6 May and expect that I will meet him again in the near future, when the funding of sport in Scotland may well be discussed.

Long-term Health Care

32. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines are issued to health boards and health trusts on the choice of health care for elderly patients requiring long-term health care.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has issued no such guidelines. Choice of health care is determined by clinical assessment and need. It is for individual health boards to determine the care needs for their elderly population and to purchase accordingly. In so doing they are expected to have due regard for the Government's community care objectives and what is best for the individual.

Economy

34. Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss the Scottish economy.

Mr. Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply earlier today to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire).

Local Services

35. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss local services.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I are next scheduled to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 22 July as part of the normal consultation on local government finance matters.

Trauma Centres

36. Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from the medical profession regarding his proposals to set up major trauma centres in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: Since publication of the report "Emergency Healthcare in Scotland: Future Structure of Accident and Emergency Services" on 11 April, no representations have been received from the medical profession.

Hospital Trusts

39. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet the chairman of the health boards to discuss the hospital trusts.

Mr. Stewart: My noble and learned Friend the Minister of State is due to meet health board chairmen on 24 June 1994.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of calls made on (a) car and (b) portable telephones in 1993-94; how much this equipment cost to buy or hire; and what were the maintenance costs.

Mr. Lang: The cost of calls made on (a) car telephones in 1993-94 amounted to £11,275; this equipment cost £6,948 to buy or hire and there were no maintenance costs. The cost of calls on (b) portable telephones was £31,236; this equipment cost £69,102 to buy or hire and the maintenance costs amounted to £2,035.

Accident and Emergency Services

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current average waiting time at each accident and emergency department for emergency cases; and what were the times at the same period in 1993.

Mr. Stewart: Information on waiting times in accident and emergency departments has not previously been collected centrally, but arrangements are in hand to collect this in future.

Fishing, Aberfeldy

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about loss of public access to fishings controlled by the Aberfeldy angling club in respect of the River Tay Catchment Area Protection Order; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Representations have been received from two parties over access to fishings on the River Tay controlled by the Aberfeldy Angling Club, one of which was on behalf of the Scottish Campaign for Public Angling. These were additional to the inquiry from the hon. Member.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Lang: There are no civil servants currently taking such legal action.

Housing Improvement

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will release immediate dedicated funding that will enable Scottish local authorities to eradicate dampness in their housing stock; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Substantial resources totalling some £426 million have been made available to local authorities for investment in their housing stock. It is for local authorities themselves to determine how to utilise the resources made available to them. However, under the housing plan system introduced on 30 April 1993 local authorities are asked to give priority to tackling condensation and dampness, within their capital programmes.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will release immediate cash funding to Scottish local authorities to enable them to upgrade and modernise housing stock in areas such as Glasgow, Pollock; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Substantial resources totalling some £426 million have been made available to local authorities in 1994-95 for investment in their housing stock. These allocations are generally not earmarked for specific purposes and it is for local authorities themselves to determine the use to which these resources are put, including the level of expenditure on the upgrading and modernisation of their stock.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what amount of money has been spent on improving and adapting privately owned, privately rented and local authority houses in Scotland in the 12-month period ended 31 March in order to accommodate the community care programme; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally.

Sheltered Accommodation

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons are currently living in sheltered accommodation in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Figures are held only centrally on the total number of sheltered dwellings in Scotland and are included in the publication "Housing Trends in Scotland: Quarter ended 31 December 1993—Table 1, HSG/1994/4" which is available in the Library.

Acquired Rights Directive

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assumption he made, in his estimate of savings on staff costs through local government reorganisation, on the applicability of the acquired rights directive to the transfer of staff to the proposed new local authorities.

Mr. Stewart: The question of whether or not the acquired rights directive applies to transfers of staff to the proposed new local authorities does not have implications for the Government's estimates of the number of posts that will be saved as a result of local government reorganisation.

Gamma Ray Survey

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received the report commissioned by his Department from the Scottish universities research and reactor centre at East Kilbride on the air gamma ray survey of parts of south-west Scotland; what evaluation has been made of the report; and what action he intends to take as a result.

Sir Hector Monro: The report of the aerial radiation survey undertaken by the Scottish Universities Research and Reactor Centre, was received in the Scottish Office on 25 March 1994. The survey was undertaken to examine the technique for rapidly monitoring radioactivity in the event of an emergency and to establish baseline radiation levels. The report offers suggestions for maintaining the aerial survey equipment in a state of readiness and makes recommendations about the monitoring and assessment of environmental radioactivity in the areas surveyed. The report's recommendations will be considered by the chief inspector of Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate.

Chapelcross Nuclear Site

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether section 6.4 in the appendix to his departmental guidance note on integrated pollution control, Scotland, applies to military nuclear activities at the Chapelcross nuclear site operated by British Nuclear Fuels.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 24 May 1994]: No uranium processes, prescribed for authorisation under integrated pollution control, are carried on at the Chapelcross nuclear site. Further, for any site subject to a nuclear site licence made under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965, any such processes are exempted from authorisation by virtue of the terms of section 6(4). Thus for both reasons the section does not apply to any activities carried on at the site.

Ferry Services

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects KPMG to conclude its review of Scottish ferry services; and when he expects to be able to publish its findings.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 24 May 1994]: We expect to receive the final report from the consultants shortly. The report is likely to contain a considerable amount of commercially sensitive information which it would not be appropriate to publish. Pending consideration of the report I cannot give any indication of whether or when any findings may be published.

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct parliamentary counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Lang: Scottish Office Ministers have not on any occasion since April 1992 requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private members. On one occasion, in respect of the Carrying of Knives Etc. (Scotland) Bill, Ministers authorised an amendment which was tabled during the Committee stage by the Bill's sponsor.

HEALTH

Medical Research

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the Government's total annual medical research commitment is as a percentage of the health budget.

Dr. Mawhinney: The United Kingdom Government's expenditure on health and medical research accounted for about 1·4 per cent. of the total United Kingdom health budget, of £37,379 million, in 1992-93.

Open Government

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the remit of the task force on open government in the NHS and its sub groups.

Dr. Mawhinney: The steering group of the task force on "Openness in the NHS", which held its first meeting in February 1994, has the following broad remit:

> "to establish a balance between effective management of health service business on the one hand, and access for the public to information and involvement in decision-taking on the other, > to provide a Code of Practice on Openness in the NHS, > to recommend guidance on information to be made available by NHS organisations, and > to make initial recommendations to the Secretary of State by June 1994."

Three working groups have been established to support the steering group by considering the issues as they relate to providers, purchasers and those who contract to provide patient services to the NHS.

The remit of all three groups is:

> "(i) To identify regularly available documents, and other categories of information, which should normally be made available to the public,
> (ii) To identify documents, and categories of information, which may not be suitable for issuing to the public,
> (iii) To make proposals on the principles underlying a scheme of fees for the release of information, and
> (iv) To put their proposals in the context of other developments which may contribute to increasing public involvement in the NHS".

Accident and Emergency Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports she has received from Trent regional health authority concerning the extent to which the accident and emergency departments at hospitals within the region reached patients charter standards during the quarter ended (a) 31 December 1993 and (b) 31 March 1994.

Dr. Mawhinney: The national health service executive does not collect centrally, as a matter of routine, information on individual national health service trusts and directly managed units in this area.

However, a special exercise is taking place to gather data for the first set of national health service performance tables which will be published shortly.

Doctors (Out-of-hours Work)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she received the report by KPMG Peat Marwick about out-of-hours work by doctors.

Dr. Mawhinney: A draft report was received on 30 March. The final version is due shortly.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against her Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Hospital Consultants

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital consultants are at present suspended from their duties; for how long each has been suspended; and how many others have been suspended over the course of the last decade.

Dr. Mawhinney: We do not collect such information. Decisions, including possible suspensions, rest with the employing authority.

Powered Wheelchairs

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to take action in response to the recommendation of the McColl report—ISBN 0 948 064 269 HMSO 1986—that high performance and dual-purpose powered chairs be provided for severely disabled people who satisfy the agreed criteria; and if growing children will be regarded as qualifying for this service.

Mr. Bowis: The issue of wheelchairs, including high performance and dual-purpose powered wheelchairs, is a matter for determination between health authority purchasers, in the light of their priorities and resources, and national health service hospital and community units. This includes provision for growing children where appropriate.

NHS Trusts

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines are given to NHS trusts in calculating full or marginal costs when bidding for contracts.

Mr. Sackville: Costing guidance given to national health service trusts, for use when negotiating contracts with NHS bodies for the provision of health care, is contained in "The Costing For Contracting Manual", which consists of FDL(93)59, FDL(93)76 and FDL(94)10.

The fundamental principles behind the costing of services within the NHS are that: price should be equal to cost, costs should be established on a full cost basis, there should be no planned cross subsidisation between "contracts" and that a minimum standard of cost classification should be established.

Price can only be established on a marginal cost basis where there is, in year, unplanned spare capacity.

The rules for private patient contracts are contained in Her Majesty's Treasury "Fees and Charges Guide".

Copies of all the documents are available in the Library.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines are issued by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority concerning the disposal of the human embryo in establishments which they license.

Mr. Sackville: Guidance is included in section 7.19 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority's code of practice, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the income derived from the sale of Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority licences in the last financial year; how much was generated by the sale of treatments; what percentage of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority's income is generated by the sale of licences and treatments; how many licences and treatments were declined; and what consideration she has given to the propriety of a medical ethics committee having to meet financial targets as part of its remit.

Mr. Sackville: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority was established by Parliament under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 to license and control centres providing certain infertility treatments, undertaking embryo research or storing gametes or embryos. The HFEA aims are to ensure the effective regulation of such centres, to promote good practice in centres and to provide relevant advice and information as necessary. One of its objectives is to identify the ethical and social implications of developments in research and treatment and to develop policy accordingly.

The HFEA's main financial regime is designed to enable it to carry out the functions laid down for it in the 1990 Act. The HFEA's main financial objective is to carry out its statutory duties efficiently, effectively and economically and to recover in licence fees the proportion of income determined by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Treasury.

In 1992-93, the last year for which audited accounts are available, licence fee income was £686,040, 66·8 per cent. of the HFEA's total budget. In the same year five licences were refused, including two for research applications. Unaudited accounts for 1993-94 show a fee income of £830,932, 70·8 per cent. of the HFEA's total budget. In that year one treatment licence was refused, one licence revoked and one licence suspended. In addition, four research applications were refused.

Information about licensed centres' income and treatments refused is not available centrally.

Child Care Services, Lambeth

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessments he has made of the further report into child care services in Lambeth which had been requested by her Department to be delivered by 1 March.

Mr. Bowis: The report into child care services in Lambeth for the period up to 1 March 1994 gave continuing cause for concern about the provision and operation of child protection and child care services in the borough, including a serious deterioration in the situation with unallocated cases. In April, Lambeth was asked to send a further report on the situation, and the steps it is taking to bring about improvement. This report is awaited.

Deregulated Drugs (Advertising)

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will take steps to ensure that major pharmaceutical companies cease their present practice of naming a specific high street retailer when advertising their newly deregulated drugs; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: No. The naming of retail outlets in advertisements for over-the-counter medicines is a matter of commercial judgment for the company concerned.

Cancer

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of research into cancer in the United Kingdom is funded by (a) charities and (b) the Government;

(2) what steps she is taking to improve funding of cancer research in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Mawhinney: The advisory group on national health service research and development priorities relating to cancer will report to the Department's central research and development committee in July. Proposals for research relating to the identified priorities will be called for later in the year.

It is impossible to identify the percentage of research into cancer in the United Kingdom as it is not known how much pharmaceutical companies invest in cancer research each year. Also, it is not possible to identify clinical research supported through local NHS research programmes or excess service costs for the NHS attributed to cancer research.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of bone cancer per 100,000 head of population there have been in England in each year since 1970.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of cancers of all types per 100,000 head of population there have been in England in each year since 1970.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the report of the conference on myalgic encephalomyelitis held in Dublin.

Mr. Sackville: None. The conference was held on 18 to 20 May and no official report of the presentations has so far emerged.

Consultants (Pension Rights)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances a consultant changing from one trust hospital to another will lose pension rights.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Press Office

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 159, what information she has about the budget for her press office in each year from 1990-91 to 1994-95 in any form that is available or as part of another budget.

Mr. Sackville: The press office is not separately identified in the overall budget for the Department's information division. The manpower cost of the present 14 staff employed in the press office is £396,108. This figure does not include other divisional running costs.

This information is not available for previous years.

City Deprivation Scores

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the deprivation score for inner London and the 10 biggest cities outside London.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available in the form requested.

Paediatric Beds

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the total number of paediatric beds in (a) the London implementation group area and (b) nationally in each of the last five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 11 May at column 157.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate for the value of fundholding allocations retained by general practitioner fundholders at the year end for 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information about general practitioner fundholders' efficiency savings for 1993-94 will not be available until later in the year.

District Health Authorities, Nottinghamshire

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list, for each NHS trust within the North Nottinghamshire and Nottingham district health authority areas, those non-executive directors who live (a) within and (b) outside the boundaries of each district health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: All chairmen and non-executive directors appointed to national health service trusts within the areas covered by the North Nottinghamshire health authority and the Nottingham health authority who live within the respective authorities boundaries are listed.

Consultant Episodes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the total number of finished consultant episodes within each English health region for 1993-94.

Mr. Sackville: Finalised figures are not yet available.

Cars (Expenditure)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure on cars by (a) regional health authorities, (b) district health authorities and (c) trusts in 1993-94.

Mr. Sackville: The information for 1993-94 is not yet available.

Birmingham Hospitals

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals there were in Birmingham in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Bryan Baker, the chairman of West Midlands regional health authority, for details.

London Hospitals

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assumptions she makes about the additional costs for teaching, research and overheads for London hospitals.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 23 May 1994]: In allocating resources, we assume that teaching hospitals incur excess costs, compared with those of other hospitals, which are attributable to the impact of teaching and research on the hospitals' services. The arrangements for allocating resources to regional health authorities include a service increment for teaching and research which recognises the excess costs. In 1994-95 they are assumed to be £37,744 per medical clinical undergraduate student outside London and £41,141 in London.

Research

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost of the research projects her Department has commissioned for the past five years; and what was the total cost of projects undertaken by staff employed by (a) universities and polytechnics, (b) independent research institutes, (c) health authorities, (d) management consultants and (e) other organisations, in each of those years.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 20 May 1994]: The total cost of research commissioned by the Department for the past five years is shown in the table and includes the Department's centrally commissioned programme for health and personal social services research:

Year	Cost £ million
1993-94	[1]33·9
1992-93	31·3
1991-92	27·4
1990-91	23·7
1989-90	19·2

[1] Estimate.

Source: Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology, HMSO, 1994.

This information does not include the cost of research carried out by Department of Health-sponsored non-departmental public bodies which is not commissioned by the Department, but by the NDPBs in line with their statutory responsibilities or in agreement with the Department of Health. The forward look includes research commissioned by the Department and by the NDPBs.

For the years before 1992-93 information about where the research was carried out was not collated centrally in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Long-term Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what action she takes to identify cases where patients require long-term or permanent levels of medical care with unusually high levels of funding requirements; and what steps are taken to assist district health authorities in meeting these additional costs;

(2) if she will ring-fence funding for special medical cases where individual care needs are of an unusually high level; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: District health authorities and general practice fundholders are responsible for purchasing health care for the identified health needs of their populations including high-cost cases.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Distribution

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage and cash amount of Overseas Development Administration assistance has been allocated to (a) bilateral aid, (b) the European Union, (c) international financial institutions, (d) east and central Europe know-how funds and (e) other recipients over each of the past five years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The breakdown of overseas development assistance is as follows:

	1988-89		1989-90		1990-91		1991-92		1992-93
	£000	Per cent.	£000	Per cent.	£000	Per cent.	£000	Per cent.	£000	Per cent.

Other ODA Expenditure—Polish Interest Stabilisation Fund.
2. Multilateral
UN Agencies, Commonwealth organisations, International research organisations.
3. Administration costs.

Investment Personnel

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the know-how fund's training for investment personnel scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The training for investment personnel scheme was introduced in August 1990 as the second of two investment support schemes for British business under the auspices of the know-how fund. To date 120 businesses have taken up TIPS grant offers totalling £2·89 million. Further details about the scheme are in the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 17 December 1993 at columns 923-24.

In the light of the growing demand for grant from British business since 1990, we have decided that the scope and criteria of the scheme should remain, but that in the future the basis for approving grant should be the number of trainees trained, with a ceiling of 70 per cent. on the proportion of eligible costs met. Small companies are likely to qualify for the higher rate of grant. The maximum amount of grant available for all applications will continue to be £50,000.

These changes will take effect on 1 June.

Paul Goodall

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list the dates on which meetings or contact was made with the Bosnian authorities to discuss the murder of Mr. Paul Goodall;

(2) what contact has been made with Interpol regarding the murder of Mr. Paul Goodall;

(3) when a representative of the Overseas Development Administration last met the public prosecutor in Zenica to discuss the murder of Mr. Paul Goodall;

(4) if a written report on the circumstances surrounding the murder of Mr. Paul Goodall has been received from the public prosecutor in Zenica;

(5) what assistance has been given to the Islamic fund-raising organisation AGASI.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answers 23 May 1994]: We are doing all we can to insist that the Bosnian authorities carry out a proper investigation into the murder of Paul Goodall and bring the killer or killers to justice. The Overseas Development Administration has had numerous contacts with the Bosnian authorities since Mr. Goodall's murder and an ODA representative last met the public prosecutor in Zenica on 8 April 1994. The Bosnian authorities have decided not to issue a report on the circumstances surrounding Mr. Goodall's murder on legal grounds as this could influence the pre-trial investigation.

The new chargé d'affairs in Sarajevo who arrived in late April has had a meeting with the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Interior Minister to press for action, and will have further contacts with the police in Sarajevo. He will shortly be travelling to Zenica to pursue the matter further there.

We understand that the Bosnian Government have not so far involved Interpol. The chargé d'affairs is encouraging the Bosnian Government to draw on all possible sources of assistance.

We have no knowledge of an Islamic fund-raising organisation called AGASI, and have given it no funding.

DEFENCE

Royal Windsor Horse Show

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the King's Troop Royal Horse Artillery did not participate in this year's royal Windsor horse show.

Mr. Hanley: The decision that the King's Troop Royal Horse Artillery should not participate in this year's royal Windsor horse show was taken by the show's committee.

Botswana

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on participation in, and costs of recent Army exercises in Botswana.

Mr. Hanley: The Army currently holds annual company level exercises in Botswana. The most recent of these took place in January/February 1994 and involved 1 Glosters. The next exercise is planned for November/December 1994 and will involve 3 Para. The cost of the last exercise was £66,000. This comprised vehicle hire of £24,000, container movement of £38,000 and additional in-theatre costs of £4,000.

Aircraft of the RAF's air transport force were used to deploy and recover the personnel and equipment involved in this exercise, within the annual flying programme for the force. Therefore, only incidental additional expenses were incurred on this aspect of the training.

Arms Imports

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) combat aircraft, (b) attack helicopters, (c) warships or other military vessels, (d) large calibre artillery launcher systems, (e) tanks, (f) armour-protected vehicles and (g) missiles and associated launch vehicles were imported into the United Kingdom in 1993 (i) permanently and (ii) temporarily.

Mr. Aitken: Imports and exports in 1993 of those equipments were reported in the United Kingdom's latest return to the United Nations Register of Conventional Arms; a copy of our return was placed in the Library of the House earlier this month.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. Aitken: There are at present 38 claims outstanding against the Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Dartmouth Naval College

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what courses other than initial officer training are offered at Britannia royal naval college Dartmouth; for how many personnel; and at what cost.

Mr. Hanley: During 1993-94 the following training courses, other than initial office training, were offered at Britannia royal naval college:

	Student numbers	Annual costs (£K)
Naval studies non-grad academic	59	11·5
International sub Lt course	30	3·8
Special duties list officers	30	6·8
Graduates technical course	37	2·6
University bursars acquaint	26	1·1
Strategic studies	11	0·8
University RN unit courses	45	0·4
CCF officers	33	0·4
Combined Cadet Forces Sea Cadet Corps	165	0·4
Short intro (SIC2)	0	0·8
Short intro (SIC4)	44	1·8
Undergraduates technical course	8	1·8

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many students from foreign and Commonwealth countries attend Britannia royal naval college, Dartmouth; and what is the annual fee income therefrom.

Mr. Hanley: In the financial year 1992-93, the most recent year for which complete figures are currently available, 143 places at Britannia royal naval college, Dartmouth were taken up by students from foreign and Commonwealth countries, generating an income of £562,000.

International Military Services Ltd.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the assets of International Military Services Ltd. have now been disposed of.

Mr. Aitken: International Military Services Ltd. ceased trading on 31 July 1991. Most assets and good will have been disposed of, but the company will not be wound up until its residual obligations have been met.

Civil Servants

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what economies in open structure grade civil servants employed within his Department are now being sought.

Mr. Aitken: Current plans involve a reduction in excess of 20 per cent. at grades 1 to 3 between 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1995. This does not take account of the outcome of the defence costs studies, which may result in further reductions.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the London-based open structure grade civil servants employed in his Department have been made redundant since the 1990 prospect study; and what savings resulted.

Mr. Aitken: My Department's policy is to minimise, through pre-redundancy measures, compulsory redundancies in civilian staff at all levels. As a result, there have been no compulsory redundancies in members of the open structure in London or elsewhere, but some 200 members of the open structure have left under early retirement schemes.

Aircraft

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had, and what representations he has received, concerning the future large aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: In recent weeks, a number of representations have been received from hon. Members about the future large aircraft. The subject has also been discussed in some detail with a team from British Aerospace, when it gave us a presentation on the subject this week.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he proposes to replace the Hercules aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We plan to replace or refurbish about half of the Hercules fleet on a rolling basis by the end of the century. We do not envisage taking a decision on the balance of the Hercules fleet, which will be considered alongside the possible replacement of other RAF transport aircraft, for a number of years.

Low Flying

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 305, since what date it has been his policy not to publish detailed information on activity in low flying areas.

Mr. Hanley: It has been our policy not to publish detailed information on activity in low flying areas since the introduction of the present United Kingdom low flying system in 1979.

Royal Arsenal, Woolwich

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on whose authority Mallet's mortar was removed from the MOD Royal Arsenal site in Woolwich; what consultations took place; what representations he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Since the 1980s, the Royal Arsenal has had an agreement with the Royal Armouries for the loan of Mallet's mortar and other artefacts. This agreement was revised in 1991 when the Royal Arsenal undertook to pay the maintenance costs of the Royal Armouries. It also stated that when the Royal Arsenal no longer required Mallet's mortar it was to be returned to the Royal Armouries. That has now been done and the mortar is at Fort Nelson, Portsmouth. I am not aware of any consultations, and have not received any representations.

D-day

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) of 10 May, Official Report, column 127, what representatives of Opposition parties have been invited to the events his Department is organising to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the D-day landings.

Mr. Hanley [pursuant to his reply, 23 May, Official Report, c. 70]: The following representatives of Opposition parties have been invited:

House of Commons

The Rt. Hon. Mrs. Margaret Beckett
The Rt. Hon. James Molyneux
The Rt. Hon. Stanley Orme
Mr. John Home Robertson

Air-to-air Missile Programme

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current status of the Royal Air Force's advanced short range air-to-air missile programme.

Mr. Aitken: I am pleased to report that the contract for development and production of an initial batch of advanced short-range air-to-air missiles awarded to British Aerospace in March 1992 is proceeding well. Progress to date has been satisfactory; British Aerospace have met all major milestones and the programme remains on schedule to meet the in-service date of December 1998.

I am also pleased to announce that, following a recent review of the operational requirements of the RAF's Harrier and new European fighter aircraft, the contract for the follow-on order of a further quantity of missiles, announced in the statement on the defence estimates 1994, has been awarded to British Aerospace.

This represents an important endorsement of the programme by the Government, is an excellent fillip for British Aerospace in its continuing efforts to promote the exportability of the missile and, with the order valued at some £66 million, is, in itself, excellent news for British industry.

Hawk Jets, Indonesia

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action Her Majesty's Government will take if the Hawk jets that Britain has exported to Indonesia are proved to have been used to commit human rights violations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I have been asked to reply.

We have no evidence that any of the Hawk aircraft supplied to Indonesia have been used to commit human rights violations. If the hon. Member has evidence, we are prepared to examine it.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Maastricht Treaty

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the procedures for informing industry, commerce and the public about the effect of the provisions of the treaty of Maastricht.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am satisfied that an appropriate effort has been made to explain the effects of the Maastricht treaty. We have issued a number of publications. Recent Foreign and Commonwealth Office publications include "Europe After Maastricht", "Britain in Europe", and "The European Elections—Why They Matter to You". The Department of Trade and Industry recently issued "The Single Market—Making It Work For You". This includes advice to business on the European Community's legislative process.

Gibraltar

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance his Department is offering to the people of Gibraltar following cuts in Government spending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have established the joint economic forum to bring those concerned together to help overcome Gibraltar's economic difficulties. The forum includes United Kingdom Government Departments, the Government of Gibraltar, trade unions and representatives of local business. We have negotiated substantial European Union funds for Gibraltar. The Ministry of Defence is offering training, and will continue to purchase local goods and services.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) of 10 May, Official Report, column 83, what arrangements have been made to enable Gibraltarians resident in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries to vote in the European elections.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Gibraltarians resident in the United Kingdom are entitled to vote in European elections. Gibraltarians resident in other member states of the European Union are entitled as citizens of the European Union to vote in European parliamentary elections on the same terms as nationals of that member state under article 8b2 of the treaty on European Union.

Wilton Park Executive Agency

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the Wilton Park executive agency performed against the targets which were agreed for 1992-93; and if targets have yet been agreed for the current year.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: According to provisional figures, which are subject to full audit, Wilton Park exceeded two of the four targets set for the 1993-94 financial year, for the number of conference participants and the cost per head to the FCO. It failed to achieve those for cost recovery and commercial income by margins of 0·1 per cent. and 0·6 per cent. respectively. Commercial income was again affected by adverse trading conditions.

The Wilton Park departmental board met on 19 April. We have agreed to the recommendation of the board that the following key targets be adopted for this financial year:

to increase overall income from £953,000 in 1993-94 to £1,039,000;

to increase cost recovery from 71·9 per cent. in 1993-94 to 72·8 per cent.;

to increase the overall number of Wilton Park conference participants from 1,077 in 1993-94 to 1,260; to reduce the average cost to the FCO of each participant from £345 in 1993-94 to £307.

It has also been agreed that for 1994-95 Wilton Park will aim to recover 80 per cent. of the costs of its commercial activities and 64 per cent. of the cost of Wilton Park conferences.

Arms Sales (Middle East)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the sale of arms to Israel and Syria.

Mr. Hurd: I have decided that, in the light of favourable developments in the middle east peace process, in particular the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho, the United Kingdom's arms embargo against Israel should be lifted. This will bring the United Kingdom into line with our European Union partners.

Forthwith, all applications for the sale of arms to Israel will be considered cases by case in the light of the international guidelines to which we are committed. Those include whether a proposed transfer would be likely to increase tension in the region or contribute to regional instability.

The Israeli Government have made it clear that they have no territorial claim on Lebanon. We hope to see progress on the Syrian track in line with that seen on the Palestinian track. In that context, we will be ready to raise with our European partners the lifting of the European Union arms embargo against Syria.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Citizens Charter

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to include in the citizens charter specific charter provisions for disabled people.

Mr. David Davis: The citizens charter applies to all users of public services. One of the six key principles of the charter is that service providers should inform their customers of the standards of service that they can expect. It is for individual organisations to decide on the specific commitments that they are able to meet in order to improve the quality of their services to disabled people.

There are currently 39 charters, of which 35 make particular reference to people with disabilities.

Parliamentary Counsel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consideration he has given to the role of civil servants in the Office of Parliamentary Counsel in preparing amendments and new clauses for private Members' Bills.

Mr. Waldegrave: The civil servants in the Office of the Parliamentary Counsel are accountable to ministers in the same way as other civil servants. Their work in preparing amendments and new clauses for private Members' Bills is, like their other work, undertaken on the authority of Ministers.

Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the expenditure on management and financial consultants by his Department in 1992-93.

Mr. David Davis: The expenditure in 1992-93 on management and financial consultants by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's Departments was:

Office of Public Service and Science and its Agencies[1]	949,031
COI	136,460
HMSO[2]	410,075

[1] This figure does not include CCTA contracts let on behalf of other government departments.

[2] HMSO records do not distinguish between types of consultancy. The figure provided represents expenditure on consultancy during the HMSO financial year January to December 1992.

Civil Estate

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what arrangements have been made to publish the efficiency unit's scrutiny report on the management of the Government's civil estate.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am pleased to publish today the Scrutiny report on the management of the Government's civil estate.

The Prime Minister has welcomed the findings. He commissioned the scrutiny in July 1993 to consider how far responsibility for civil estate properties could be passed to Departments and agencies and to identify central systems which should be retained or established. The Government will now proceed to implement the report's broad findings. The report's main recommendations are:

that Departments should take responsibility as principals for the property they occupy;

that property holdings should be reconstituted as an executive agency; to co-ordinate the Government's market activity on the civil estate and to promote rationalisation of the estate; to provide Departments with a body of off-the-shelf advice and support; and to provide intelligent customer support to those Departments who do not have in-house facilities. (The Government will consider further which Department is to sponsor the new agency.)

The scrutiny team was also asked to look specifically at the management of historic buildings on the civil estate and extended its review to include historic building issues on the defence estate. The team concluded that the arrangements introduced in 1992 for regular audit and monitoring of the condition of the historic estate had started well and should be given further time to work. New guidance should be provided to Departments on procedures for the disposal of surplus historic property. This would ensure that the special considerations which may arise in connection with heritage disposals are taken fully into account in applying normal disposal rules.

Copies of the efficiency unit scrutiny have been placed in the Library of the House.

Public Bodies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the non-departmental bodies in England the conduct of which can be referred to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

Mr. Waldegrave: The following non-departmental public bodies fall within the jurisdiction of the PCA. Those NDPBs with a remit specific to Wales or Scotland only have been omitted from the list.

Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (ACAS)
Agricultural Wages Committees
Arts Council of Great Britain

British Council
British Film Institute

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Waldegrave: Parliamentary Counsel draft not on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. No amendments were drafted since April 1992 by parliamentary counsel on instructions from my Department. However, some of the amendments tabled during the Committee and Report stages of the Right to Know Bill were prepared by my officials with advice from Parliamentary Counsel.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Licence Fees

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he will have consultations within the European Community concerning the proposed directive on licence fees for television and radio.

Mr. Brooke: I have no knowledge of any proposed directive on this matter.

Football Stadiums

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will grant time extensions to any of the premier league and first division football clubs in respect of the Government's 1 August all-seater deadline.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's policy has been that premier league and first division football clubs should eliminate standing accommodation from their grounds by 1 August 1994. The policy was first announced in January 1990, when the Government accepted the recommendations in Lord Justice Taylor's final report. This policy was reaffirmed in the Government's response to the Home Affairs Committee report on policing football hooliganism in May 1991 and again in July 1992, following a review of the policy by the former Secretary of State. In recognition of the costs involved, the Government reduced pool betting duty in the 1990 budget, making available to clubs some £20 million each year since then via the Football Trust, on the understanding that these funds will be used for major projects associated with Taylor implementation.

I am pleased to report that the majority of clubs in the top two divisions will meet or are planning to meet the deadline. I congratulate those clubs on the great strides they have made in improving the safety and comfort of spectators at their grounds. I have, however, indicated that I will consider extensions to the deadline in exceptional cases.

The all-seater policy will be enforced by means of the licensing system operated by the Football Licensing Authority under the Football Spectators Act 1989. Under section 11(1) and (2) of the 1989 Act I am empowered to make an order directing the FLA to include certain specified conditions about seating in the licences that it issues to clubs. Before making such an order, I am required to consult the FLA, which in turn is required to consult local authorities before making recommendations to me. The FLA consulted local authorities and clubs on 17 December 1993, asking for comments by 28 February. It submitted its main recommendations in mid-April together with copies of the representations made by local authorities and clubs. It submitted further representations in relation to two late applications at the end of April.

Of the 12 clubs that have formally applied for an extension, one—Oxford United—has been relegated to division 2, which is not subject to the 1994 deadline. I have considered the case made by the remaining 11 clubs, taking into account the recommendations made by the Football Licensing Authority.

On the basis of the information I have before me, I have today written to the chairmen of both clubs to inform them of my preliminary view in each case, and offering them the opportunity to submit further representations.

I have written to the chairmen of the following clubs, all of which are actively engaged in relocation to new stadiums, indicating that I am minded to agree that they have a valid case for an extension to the 1 August deadline:

Derby County
Grimsby Town
Middlesbrough
Portsmouth
Sunderland

I have warned, however, that although I am considering whether to grant an extension, my general policy remains, and I have in mind that any extension should be for a limited period only.

I have also explained that any decision to allow the retention of standing accommodation for a limited period will not affect safety requirements at the ground. Clubs will still be required to observe the terms and conditions of the local authority safety certificate issued under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975, and any requirement placed on the club as a result of the FLA exercising its powers under section 13 of the 1989 Act. The responsibility of each club to ensure that the ground meets the necessary safety requirements remains unchanged, irrespective of whether or not an extension is granted.

I have also written to the chairmen of the following clubs indicating that, while I appreciate the very real difficulties faced, I do not consider that the case presented to date is sufficiently strong to warrant an extension of the deadline beyond 1 August 1994:

Barnsley
Chelsea
Manchester City
Newcastle United
Oldham Athletic Swindon Town

In arriving at my preliminary view, I have applied the criterion adopted by the Football Licensing Authority, which were set out in the FLA's letters of 13 November 1992 and 17 December 1993 as follows:

> Clubs seeking an extension in order to relocate to a new ground are expected to produce clear evidence that such an extension would be for a strictly limited period and that the club could realistically complete its relocation within a reasonable and definite timescale.
> Clubs applying for an extension in order to redevelop their existing grounds are expected to show why their circumstances are wholly exceptional, why the reasons for the delay could not reasonably have been foreseen, and why they could not be attributed to the actions or inaction of the club.

I must stress that I have not yet made my final decision, and before I do so I think it only right that the clubs affected should have the opportunity to comment and to make further representations to me if they feel that this would be appropriate.

In reaching my final decision I will consider each case on its individual merits in the light of the above criteria, having regard to all material facts and to the need to be consistent where circumstances are similar and fair to all clubs in the premier league and football league, first division. I will also take into account any other relevant points which the clubs wish to make in response to my letters.

I am acutely aware that it is important that clubs have as much time as possible to prepare for the 1994-95 football season. I therefore propose to end any uncertainty about the outcome of my deliberations within a matter of weeks rather than months. Clubs have been asked for any comments they may have on the contents of my letters, or for any further representations they may wish me to take into consideration, by Thursday 16 June at the very latest. My final decision will follow as soon as possible thereafter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Child Care

Mr. Mudie: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, pursuant to the answer from the Chairman of the Administration Committee on 17 May, Official Report, column 416, when the Commission will publish the details of the survey into child care in the parliamentary estate.

Mr. Beith: This matter is still under consideration by the Commission.

Intelligence Services

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will establish the parliamentary oversight committee of the intelligence services before the summer recess.

Mr. Newton: The intelligence services legislation provides for members of the Intelligence and Security Committee to be appointed by the Prime Minister after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition. Since commencement of the Act is still some months away, I would not expect the Committee to be appointed yet.

Parliamentary Counsel

Mr. Spring: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) of 19 May, Official Report, column 959, if he will publish the full text of the letter on the drafting of amendments from the head of the civil service to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to which he referred.

Mr. Newton: I have arranged for copies of the correspondence to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Lord President of the Council on which private Members' Bills, introduced into either House of Parliament since April 1992, Parliamentary Counsel has been involved in drafting amendments which have subsequently been tabled in the names of Members of either House, other than Ministers.

Mr. Newton: Parliamentary Counsel drafts amendments on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. How many of these were subsequently tabled by Members of either House is not centrally recorded.

DEFENCE

Dartmouth Naval College

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual intake at, and graduation from, Britannia Royal Naval College Dartmouth; what are the annual running costs; how many (a) service and (b) civilian personnel are employed there, and in what professional and other groups.

Mr. Hanley: During the last training year, the intake at Britannia Royal Naval College was 861. This number includes 433 students who attended courses, including the officer new entry course, from which 401 graduated; the remaining 428 students attended courses from which there is no formal graduation.

The annual running costs excluding sea training for Britannia Royal Naval College for the last three financial years are as follows:

FY 1991-92	15,800,000
FY 1992-93	18,500,000
FY 1993-94	[1]18,900,000

[1] Estimate.

The total number of Service personnel employed at the college is 129, and is broken down as follows:

	Number
Officers	50
Warrant Officers	3
Senior Ratings	[1]36
Junior Ratings	40

[1] Includes 4 RM.

The total number of civilian staff employed at the college is 169·5 and is broken down as follows:

	Number
Defence Administration Group	29·0
Defence Engineering and Science Group	45·5
Other	14·0
Industrial	81·0

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the known atomic test veterans listed on departmental files were contacted as part of the study on mortality and comparative health of atomic test veterans conducted for his Department by the National Radiological Protection Board, published last December; and what criteria were adopted in choosing those former service men to contact as part of the study.

Mr. Hanley: The independent study conducted by the National Radiological Protection Board was a statistical analysis of the health and service records of more than 21,000 test participants. The NRPB acquired information from a variety of independent and official sources including the British Atomic Veterans Association, the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association, the Royal British Legion, the Department of Social Security, besides NRPB and MOD records. Thus there was not a requirement to contact test participants directly.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he replied to Mr. Denzil Hancock of Abertillery, Gwent, in regard to his letter on the National Radiological Protection Board study of atomic test veterans.

Mr. Hanley: My officials have no record of receiving the letter referred to.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to examine the proposals set out in the recent report by the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament on a blueprint for a nuclear weapon-free world and the 1995 non-proliferation treaty conference, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Hanley: My Department has no record of having received this document. We have arranged for a copy to be provided to us, however, and we will examine its proposals carefully.

Matra Marconi Space

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made concerning the sale by British Aerospace of its space systems business to Matra Marconi Space; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: If such a proposal is announced, my Department will if necessary advise the regulatory authorities in the usual manner on any competition and national security implications. Such advice is, of course, confidential.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Department has had with the United States authorities regarding the disposal of hazardous wastes shipped to the United Kingdom for disposal from bases of the United States armed forces in Europe.

Mr. Hanley: Officials of my Department have occasionally discussed with the appropriate United States authorities the disposal of hazardous wastes imported into the United Kingdom. The handling of such waste in the United Kingdom is carried out in accordance with national and international regulations governing the movement and destruction of hazardous waste.

RNAD, Beith

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current workload, numbers employed and future prospects at the Royal Naval armaments depot, Beith.

Mr. Hanley: At present some 500 personnel are employed at RNAD Beith. The depot plays an important and active role in supporting both the Navy and the RAF in the storage and processing of a wide range of armaments. By the end of 1994, the depot will have assumed further non-armament engineering tasks which have been transferred from other MOD establishments. The future of the depot, which is currently subject to a market-testing exercise, is being reviewed, along with other MOD establishments, as part of the defence costs study.

Bosnia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will decide whether British troops will be deployed in Bosnia this winter; and what are the crucial factors affecting that decision.

Mr. Hanley: The deployment of British forces in Bosnia is kept under constant review. A decision on whether the current deployment will continue through the winter will be taken later this year and will take account of factors such as the situation on the ground, humanitarian needs, UNPROFOR's ability to carry out its mandate without unacceptable risk to the safety of its forces, and progress towards an overall peace agreement.

"Friendly Fire" Incident

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent communications he has received from the United States Government about the shooting down of two United Nations helicopters by aircraft of the United States air force.

Mr. Hanley: The two United States helicopters shot down in northern Iraq on 14 April are the subject of a United States investigation. The United Kingdom has two representatives on the inquiry and they are taking a full part in the proceedings. We have been kept regularly informed of the progress of the investigation and will make the results available as soon as possible.

Defence Contractors

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the letter of the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West of 16 May, if he will list the 40 contracts held by Airwork Ltd. for the Ministry of Defence; and if he will list those which are in the majority that have been rated as satisfactory.

Mr. Aitken: Airwork Ltd. is contracted by my Department to carry out a wide variety of support activities, including:

Provision of Simulator Instructor and maintenance of simulator and supply of spares
Provision of aircraft Maintenance Services
Post Design Work
Maintenance of Communications Equipment at various locations
Provision of Helicopter Support and On Call Maintenance
Servicing of maintenance of Range Safety Radars and Ground Radio
Provision of Flying Instruction
Servicing of Aircraft
Repair and Reconditioning of Spares

As stated in my letter dated 16 May 1994 to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, in general these contracts are being performed satisfactorily.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the letter from the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, dated 16 May, if he will list the names of all the contractors placed on the Ministry of Defence list of contractors requiring special attention; on what date they were placed on that list; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The list is maintained for internal use only, as part of my Department's risk management technique. It is treated as "commercial in confidence" and therefore I am not prepared to identify the contractors currently on it.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the letter of the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, dated 16 May, on what date Airwork Ltd. was placed on the Ministry of Defence list of contractors requiring special attention.

Mr. Aitken: On 21 May 1993.

Royal Navy Exercises

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now give further details regarding the introduction of a system for broadcasting details of firing intentions in local sea areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: I am pleased to announce, as foreshadowed in my answer to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on 3 March, Official Report, columns 871-72 that from Wednesday 1 June 1994 the Royal Navy is to introduce a new information service for advising fishermen and other mariners of gun and missile firings in designated exercise areas around the United Kingdom. The time and approximate geographic locations of all planned live firings—other than with small arms—and underwater explosions will be broadcast twice a day by the Royal Navy: where appropriate this will also include the times of firing flares, other illuminants, and naval gunfire support firings using sea ranges and inert ammunition. This new broadcasting of information is to be known colloquially as GUNFACTS.

A broadcast scheme for transmitting information of this nature has been operating in the heavily used Portland exercise area for almost two years, and has proved successful in ensuring that civil craft using these waters are aware of Royal Navy firing activity. The aim now is to extend the arrangements operating in the Portland areas to cover all exercise areas around the United Kingdom in which gunnery and missile firings and underwater explosions take place.

The introduction of the United Kingdom-wide broadcasting arrangements for GUNFACTS does not reflect any shortcomings in the Royal Navy's existing range safety procedures, which are already rigorous and comprehensive: the intention is, rather, to complement the existing measures. As such, the introduction of this scheme represents a further step forward in maritime safety and underlines our continuing commitment to ensure safe operations by the Royal Navy at sea.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, when the first test firing of a United Kingdom Trident II D5 missile is expected to take place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: HMS Vanguard is scheduled today to launch an unarmed Trident II D5 ballistic missile off the coast of Florida as part of her demonstration and shakedown operation. I shall inform the House of the outcome of the firing in due course.

Adventurous Training Facilities

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the single service and joint service adventurous training facilities maintained by funds from his Department, showing the costs, staffing and principal equipment of each.

Mr. Hanley: Adventurous training is, and will continue to be, an essential part of armed forces training, developing the qualities of fitness, courage, initiative, powers of endurance, leadership and interdependence which are essential to each service. The information requested, with costs for financial year 1993-94, will be placed in the Library.

WALES

Interreg

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he met representatives of West Glamorgan to discuss its inclusion in Interreg; when he met his Irish counterpart to discuss adding south-east Eire and south-west Wales to the United Kingdom submission; when subsequently he made written representations on behalf of West Glamorgan and to whom; and what was the reason for the time lag between his meeting with the Irish Minister and his written submission.

Mr. Redwood: I will write to the right hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement regarding the future of ADAS in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture announced the 1994-95 cost recovery targets and the associated restructuring of ADAS in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves) on 25 February 1994, Official Report, columns 492-93. The agency's activities in Wales are being carried forward and its organisation adjusted in line with that. Detailed operational matters are the responsibility of the chief executive.

My right hon. Friend and I also announced on 22 September 1993 that a study of the future corporate status of ADAS is being undertaken. A further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Agriculture One-stop Shops

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to introduce agriculture one-stop shops in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: In my speech at the annual general meeting of the Farmers Union of Wales on 11 May, I announced plans to provide the opportunity for all farmers in Wales to receive free agri-environmental advice through a streamlined system, which will be both simple and effective. Farmers will gain access to advice through a single clearing-house which will direct both telephone and written inquiries to an adviser who will be the single point of contact for the farmer. The adviser will provide the farmer with impartial sound advice on all the environmental aspects of farming and the support schemes available. Further details will be announced soon.

Local Government (Wales) Bill (Amendments)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his oral statement of 15 March, Official Report, column 758, on what date he requested parliamentary draftsmen to prepare the amendments for clause 44 of the Local Government (Wales) Bill [Lords].

Mr. Redwood: It is not the practice to provide details of internal decisions of this kind.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Pollution

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received regarding pollution of water supplies resulting in inconvenience to consumers for each year since 1986.

Mr. Atkins: This information is not readily available and can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many areas have been designated as areas of protection under the Water Resources Act 1991; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has for changes to legislation to deter polluters of water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: It is for the National Rivers Authority to apply for the making of an order under section 93 of the Water Resources Act 1991 for the designation of a water protection zone. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are currently considering the first such application by the NRA, in respect of the River Dee.

Regardless of any specific protective measures. it is in general an offence, punishable by an unlimited fine or a prison sentence or both, to pollute watercourses or water supplies.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current level of debt for each local authority in the west midlands county.

Mr. Curry: At 31 March 1993, the total outstanding debt for each local authority in the area of the former west midlands county council was as follows:

	£ million
Birmingham	1,233
Coventry	385
Dudley	277
Sandwell	284
Solihull	71
Walsall	301
Wolverhampton	309

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the topics to be included in the 1994 review of standard spending assessment; and what resources his Department will be devoting to the 1994 review of standard spending assessments, in terms of (a) the number of full-time equivalent posts and the estimated staff costs and (b) the cost of externally commissioned research.

Mr. Curry: A wide-ranging review of standard spending assessments was carried out in 1993. The Government do not propose to carry out a similar review this year. Their policy on further changes in SSAs was set out in its response to the first report from the Select Committee on the Environment, Cm 2494, and in paragraphs 32 and 33 in particular. Possible topics relating to SSAs which may be discussed with the local authority associations this year were set out in a paper for the SSA sub-group. A copy has been placed in the Library.

The division primarily concerned with SSAs has a complement of 12·8 full-time equivalent posts, the cost of which is some £420,000 per year. The Department expects to commission external research relating to SSAs, the cost of which will be met from the budget for local government research as a whole of £534,000 in 1994-95. Actual expenditure in 1994-95 will depend on the prices offered by contractors and the timing of the work but is not expected to exceed £50,000.

Flood Prevention

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent local authorities that are allocated money for flood prevention by his Department are able to vire the money to other purposes.

Mr. Curry: My Department does not allocate money to local authorities specifically for flood prevention. However the standard spending assessment methodology used to distribute revenue support grant includes an element for flood defence which is based on the previous year's expenditure. Since RSG in unhypothecated, where this element exceeds the amount levied by the National Rivers

Authority for flood defence in any year, authorities themselves decide how best to use any additional resources in the light of local needs and priorities. This principle applies equally to all services included in the SSA system.

Tenants' Ombudsman

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many complaints have been received by the housing association tenants' ombudsmen in England and Scotland from the date that the respective services became operational in December 1993.

Sir George Young: The housing association tenants' ombudsman service, which covers the activities of registered housing associations in England, has received 412 complaints in its first six months of operation—from November 1993 to April 1994. In the case of Scotland, for which the arrangements are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, I am advised that in its first full month of operation—April 1994—the service there received 12 complaints.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how the services of the housing association tenants' ombudsmen are advertised to housing association tenants.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation has distributed posters and leaflets about the housing association tenants ombudsman service to all registered housing associations in England, as well as to citizens' advice bureaux, local libraries, law centres and housing advice centres.

Council Houses, Harrogate

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of council houses owned by Harrogate borough council.

Sir George Young: Harrogate borough council reported a total of 5,234 council dwellings in its April 1993 housing investment programme return, a copy of which is in the Library.

Energy Saving

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress towards meeting the United Nations conference on environment and development at Rio de Janerio obligations in so far as they concern energy saving in the domestic market.

Mr. Atkins: The framework convention on climate change, which was signed by 153 countries at the Rio Earth summit in June 1992 and came into force in March this year commits developed countries to take measures aimed at returning emissions of greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by 2000. The United Kingdom climate change United Kingdom programme, which was published in January, sets out in full the measures aimed at meeting the convention commitment. These include measures affecting the domestic energy sector, which are expected to reduce emissions by 4 million tonnes of carbon—MtC—against projected CO_2 emissions by 2000.

Residential Property, Hull

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by what percentage each year the rebuilding costs per square foot have increased between 1964 and 1990 for residential property built before 1920 in Hull.

Sir George Young: Figures for Hull are not available, but there is no reason to suppose that these differ significantly from increases in rebuilding costs for residential property nationally which were as follows:

Year	Percentage increase
1964	0
1965	5
1966	7

Private Rented Housing

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the change in size of the private rented sector over the period 1981 to 1993.

Sir George Young: The information for England is as follows:

Privately rented dwellings and households 1981 to 1993
England

Notes:

1. Dwellings figures are at the end of December except for 1981, when they are for April, and 1991 when figures are shown for both April and December.
2. Household figures are estimates from the Labour Force Survey and are subject to sampling error. They are for the period March to May each year.

A statistical paper explaining the derivation of these figures is to be included in the May issue of "Housing Finance". I will place a copy in the Library as soon as it is available.

Habitats Directive

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to implement the EC habitats directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are firmly committed to the transposition of the directive into United Kingdom law. We expect to lay draft regulations for this purpose before Parliament soon after the Whitsun recess. The regulations will be made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 and will require the approval of Parliament before they can come into effect. The directive requires the necessary laws, regulations and administrative provisions to be brought into force within two years of its notification on 5 June 1992. Although this target will not quite be achieved, our first priority must be to ensure that the draft regulations, which are very complex, fulfil the directive's requirements.

The Government issued a public consultation paper in October 1993 indicating what provisions were considered necessary to implement the directive. The responses to this consultation, and that undertaken in March 1993 concerning proposed changes to permitted development rights to comply with the directive, have been considered during the process of framing the draft regulations.

Subject to parliamentary approval, the regulations will establish mechanisms for the designation and protection of sites qualifying under the EC habitats and birds directives. They will also cover species protection aspects of the habitats directive. These measures will provide a self-contained body of legislation to give effect to the directive's requirements and will build on the already comprehensive provisions for habitats and species conservation in existing law and policy.

Calderdale Metropolitan Borough Council

Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet considered the response by Calderdale metropolitan borough council to the notice served on the authority on 23 December 1993 under section 13 of the Local Government Act 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend, after carefully considering the response which Calderdale metropolitan borough made to the notice served on the authority, has decided to give the authority a direction under section 14 of the Local Government Act 1988. The effect of the direction is to require the authority to re-tender the ground maintenance work which was the subject of the notice by 1 June 1995. The direction also requires the authority, when re-tendering the work, to draw up a contingency plan to cover the remedying of defects in the contractor's performance and/or procuring the service of another contractor in the event of contractor failure, to which any performance bond requirement would be related. The authority must agree the contingency plan, and the terms of any performance bond requirement, with an independent arbitrator appointed by the Institute of Leisure and Amenity Management.

Farm Shops

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Government's planning policy towards applications for farm shops.

Mr. Baldry: Farm shops help meet demand from consumers who want fresh produce at the point of production and can provide new sources of jobs and services in rural area and outlets for producers of regional and speciality foods. Advice on the circumstances in which planning applications are needed for farm shops is provided in planning policy guidance note 7, paragraph B2. When planning applications are needed, local planning authorities should take account of:

(i) the desirability for the farmer to provide a service throughout the year, which may require him to bring in non-local[1] produce to overcome the problems of seasonality and provide continuity of employment and to ensure that a sufficiently wide selection of produce can be offered;

(ii) the potential impact on nearby village shops; and

(iii) the transport effects in terms of the traffic likely to be generated and the highways, access and parking arrangements.

[1] In this context "non-local" means produce originating from beyond the farm holding and its environs. Local planning authorities should not discriminate against produce orginating outside the United Kingdom. This applies equally to produce which is packed on the farm but which originates from outside it.

In individual cases where the development of an unrestricted retail use on a farm shop would be likely to result in a significant adverse effect on a nearby village shop, the local authority may wish to consider the scope for using planning conditions to limit the broad types of produce sold in the farm shop so as to enable permission to be given. Guidance on the use of conditions is contained in the DOE circular 1/85.

Travellers

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date in April the Minister for Local Government met in Bradford Mr. Graham Ablewhite, managing director of Sparks confectioners, with head offices in Hockney road, Bradford; what undertakings the Minister gave regarding action concerning the use of unofficial sites by travellers within Bradford metropolitan district; what specific action he has taken in this matter since meeting Mr. Ablewhite; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 23 May 1994]: I met Graham Ablewhite during a non-departmental visit to Bradford on 29 April. While there, I promised to seek advice on the background from officials in my Department; I plan to write.

SCOTLAND

Mental Health Services

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what specific instructions he has provided to the purchasers of mental health services in respect of the seriously mentally ill.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has issued no such instructions. The organisation of mental health services is determined by clinical assessment and local need. It is for individual health boards to assess the needs for their population and to purchase mental health services accordingly. In so doing they are expected to have due regard for the Government's community care objectives and what is best for individuals.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what specific instructions he has issued, and to whom, on good practice on hospital discharge for mentally disordered people and on continuing care for mentally disordered people.

Mr. Stewart: Three circulars on this matter have been made available. "Discharge of Patients from Mental Illness and Mental Handicap Hospitals", SW10/1988 was sent to directors of social work and copied to general managers of health boards on 1 June 1988, and dealt with the management issues. "Assessment and Care Management", SW11/1991 HHD/DGM, (1191)40 was issued on 17 June 1991, and "Guidance on Care Programmes for People with a Mental Illness including Dementia", SOHHD DGM 1992/9 SW 1992/1 was issued on 7 February 1992. These were sent to general managers of health boards, the Common Services Agency, the state hospital and the Health Education Board for Scotland, and to chief executives of district councils, appropriate professional and voluntary bodies, directors of social work and directors of housing. Local bodies have developed discharge protocols based on this guidance.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to issue instructions within one year on the minimum acceptable provisions for mental health services by way of (a) 24-hour staffed community houses, (b) day-staffed residential care, (c) day centres and hospital places and (d) provision of community-based multi-discipline teams; and if he will bring forward proposals to require the inspection of such establishments every three years.

Mr. Stewart: These are not matters on which central guidance on standards would be practical. The frequency of inspections is a matter for determination in the light of local circumstances but some guidance has been offered on the frequency of inspection which would be appropriate for residential accommodation.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the use of discharge contracts by health boards in respect of the mentally ill.

Mr. Stewart: Health boards do not use discharge contracts. Patients assessed as requiring continuing specialist medical and nursing care are the responsibility of health boards. Those patients who are discharged and do not require such care have their needs assessed by the local authority taking account of the views of health care professionals. An individual care programme should then be drawn up.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made as to the nature of the staff most likely to be made redundant following local government reorganisation; in which councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The Government have estimated that following local government reorganisation, a structure of 32 single-tier authorities will require between 220 and 1,800 fewer staff posts across Scotland. Sensible manpower planning by local authorities in the run-up to reorganisation should ensure that staff numbers are controlled largely by natural wastage and early retirement measures. It will be for the new authorities themselves to determine the number and nature of staff that they require to carry out their functions.

Public Service Vehicles (Missiles)

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many reported cases of missiles being thrown at public service vehicles there have been in each of the last five years in each police authority area in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of how morale in NHS trust hospitals has been affected by changes in the numbers of staff on short-term contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The numbers of staff on short-term contracts is determined by the employing authority, whether NHS trust or health board. Any assessment of a relationship between morale and changes in the numbers of staff on such contracts in an NHS trust hospital is a matter for the trust hospital itself.

The NHS in Scotland management executive is concerned to improve morale in the NHS in Scotland and, following a survey on the impact of the 1991 document "Framework for Action", has asked employing authorities to develop action plans to tackle those issues which are identified as requiring action locally. The outcome of these action plans will be reported to the management executive in February 1995.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that clinical directors in NHS trust hospitals have greater access to finance and information management training to help them participate in contract negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: National training provision is made through short courses available from the management development group at the Scottish health service centre and by the management education for clinicians project which receive funds from the Scottish Council for Postgraduate Medical and Dental Education for this purpose.

A focused mailing to clinical directors in Scotland took place in January 1994 to draw attention to existing courses on NHS information and financial management. Another mailing is planned for summer 1994. MEC has been involved in providing trust-based programmes for clinical directors for eight NHS trusts to date; all those programmes include sessions on finance, contracting and NHS information.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to increase the participation of clinical directors in negotiating contracts within NHS trust hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Health boards and NHS trusts are responsible for deciding the make-up of their contracting negotiating teams. However, guidance issued by the management executive has always sought to encourage and emphasise the role of clinicians and other health professionals in the contracting process.

Ferry Services

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the KPMG consultants report on the Scottish ferry services will be published.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) yesterday, Official Report, 25 May 1994, column 208.

Scottish Prison Service

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what targets he has set the Scottish Prison Service agency for 1994-95.

Mr. Lang: I have set the chief executive of the Scottish Prison Service the following targets:

Performance measures	Key targets
The number of prisoners unlawfully at large.	No 'A' category prisoners should escape.
	The number of escapes by 'B' category prisoners should not exceed 2·5 per 1,000 prisoners.
The number of significant incidents.	The number of significant incidents should not exceed 11.
The number of serious assaults on staff and prisoners.	The number of serious assaults on staff should not exceed 5 per 1,000 staff.
	The number of serious assaults on other prisoners should not exceed 10 per 1,000 prisoners.
Basic quality of life for prisoners.	By April 1995 60 per cent. of available prisoner places will have access to forms of night sanitation.
The amount of available opportunities for prisoners' self development.	80 per cent. of convicted prisoners should have the opportunity of at least 7 hours per working day of programmed activities.
Time out of cell for unconvicted prisoners.	On average 25 per cent. of unconvicted prisoner hours should be available for out of cell activities.
Average annual cost per prisoner place.	To keep costs within £26,624 per place available for use.

Performance measures	Key targets
The level of absence through staff sickness.	To reduce the average number of days lost per person per year through staff sickness to 18.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines or instructions he has given about the statistics or information that a hospital trust must keep.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 20 May 1994]: Guidance was issued on 27 April on the central requirements for work force information. Trusts are also expected to keep the same information and statistics which hospitals and health boards would have kept when the units were directly managed. In addition trusts are required to provide monthly returns to the management executive on their finances and activity.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, columns 262-63, on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Lilley: On one occasion, 20 April 1994.

Jurors

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to pay expenses and national insurance contributions for those on jury service who are unemployed on the same basis as for those in employment.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply. Members of the public performing jury service are subject to the same regulations in respect of allowances for expenses, whether unemployed or in emloyment. These regulations came into operation on 1 January 1979. Additionally, in April 1988 the Department of Social Security introduced a system to ensure that unemployed people on jury service could maintain a full national insurance contribution record in the same way as those in employment.

Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals in each region have claimed industrial injuries disablement benefit for chronic bronchitis or emphysema under stage one of the approval scheme; and how many claims have been approved.

Mr. Scott: The table shows the number of valid claims received and the number successful as at 6 February 1994. Not all the claims received by 6 February would have been processed by that date.

Child Support Agency

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) whether a student who is a parent without custody will have his or her income taken into account if earning money for more than five weeks and if the parent with custody applies for a maintenance assessment;

(2) if he will make a statement about the operation of the Child Support Act 1991 in respect of students who are parents without custody;

(3) whether a parent without custody who is a student will have earnings assessed for maintenance only if the parent with custody applies after the student has worked more than five weeks;

(4) what are the rules governing the treatment of temporary earnings by students who are parents without custody;

(5) whether income earned for more than five weeks by a student, who is a parent without custody, will be averaged and dealt with as the person's average income for the entire year whether or not the earnings continue; and whether that estimated annual income is added to grants or loans received by the student in calculating the amount of maintenance to be paid.

Mr. Burt: A maintenance assessment made by the Child Support Agency applies from the date that the maintenance inquiry form is issued to an absent parent or, where there was previously a court order, from two days after the assessment is made.

There are special provisions for assessing maintenance where the absent parent is a student. He is not required to make payments unless he has income other than from a grant, grant contribution or student loan. Where he does have other income and a maintenance assessment is made, the grant and loan elements are averaged to give a weekly income figure for the weeks for which they are paid. Any element in respect of the costs of his studies—such as examination fees or books—is ignored, as is £10 of the weekly value of a student loan.

The absent parent's average weekly earnings are calculated over the year preceding the issue of the maintenance inquiry form. If he has been a student for a period of less than a year, the calculation is made for the period of studentship. Where child support officers, who make the assessments, consider that the calculation does not produce a representative figure, they have discretion to calculate earnings over a different period. In the vast majority of cases, students would not be liable for maintenance.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all those organisations which made submissions on the child support proposals following the publication in 1990 of "Children Come First", Cm 1264.

Mr. Burt: The following organisations responded to the White Paper "Children Come First", In addition, comments were received from some 100 private individuals and 85 hon. Members.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the response rates to all telephone inquiries to the inquiry line and Child Support Agency centres serving the west midlands within the last 12 months.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Ms Joan Walley, dated 26 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about telephone enquiries to the Child Support Agency.

I am afraid that the Agency does not keep statistics in the form that you have requested. However, I can tell you that between 12 April 1993 and 8 April 1994, the Agency received a total of 676,018 calls on the National Enquiry Line, 97,887 of which were dealt with at the Agency's Centre in Dudley. On average, Dudley Centre also dealt with approximately 140,000 calls a month which were dialled to the Centre switchboard.

The first year of the Agency's operations has stimulated a great deal of activity and I am aware of the difficulties experienced by some clients in contacting the Agency by telephone. We have already examined ways in which this service can be improved, and are now making some changes.

From the end of June, new National Enquiry Line arrangements will be put into effect involving some 60-80 staff the majority of whom will already be experienced in dealing with telephone enquiries and who will be suitably trained in Agency business. These staff will be centrally located, rather than as now spread throughout the Agency's Centres, with the aim of providing a more dedicated core service. Additionally, from the end of June the Agency will begin implementing a new system whereby each Centre will centralise its handling of telephone enquiries.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much extra money has gone to the Treasury since the Child Support Agency started operations;

(2) how much extra money has gone to the children of families with an absent parent since the Child Support Agency started operations.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 26 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the amount of money which has gone to the Treasury and the amount to the children of families with an absent parent since the Child Support Agency started operations.

At the end of March the Agency had recorded £335 million in benefit savings in 1993-94. This does not represent the total savings as some will be recorded retrospectively.

Where maintenance is paid direct from one parent to the other, and the collection service provided by the Agency is not used, the Agency would not as a matter of course receive information on the amount or frequency of maintenance payments made. Records are therefore not available of the total sums paid.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Mr. Hoon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 353 if he will explain the method used by his Department to calculate the number of cases taken on by the Child Support Agency where people were not already paying maintenance; and for what reason these figures are given as an estimate.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ros Hepplewhite to Mr. Geoffrey Hoon, dated 26 May 1994:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about cases taken on by the Child Support Agency.

The number of cases taken on by the Child Support Agency where people were not already paying maintenance is calculated from the number of cases of different types taken on by the Agency and the proportion of cases of each type in which maintenance was not already in payment.

Whilst information is available on the number of cases of each type taken on, actual data on the proportions in which maintenance was not already in payment is not collected for all case types. These figures are therefore based on estimates which, for new and repeat income support cases, represent the proportion of cases with maintenance already in payment prior to Agency involvement and are derived from the Department's Annual Statistical Enquiry. For Family Credit cases a similar estimate is derived from the Departmental Family Credit Statistics.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the results of the consultation exercise on the possible introduction of a minimum solvency requirement for pension schemes.

Mr. Hague: We received completed questionnaires on nearly 500 schemes showing their on-going funding level and solvency level calculated using a valuation method on the lines of that proposed by the Pension Law Review Committee. Those figures were compared with those obtained using a modified valuation method developed in the light of concerns expressed about the working of the original proposal. The findings will be of great help in the further development of an appropriate minimum solvency requirement and I am grateful to all who participated in the exercise. Results of the exercise are published today. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Social Fund

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the social fund budget for his Department's offices within the London borough of Wandsworth in each of the last three years; and what was the amount of loans made in each of those years.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 26 May 1994:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about Social Fund budgets for offices within the London Borough of Wandsworth.

Statistical information is recorded by Benefits Agency District, the boundaries of which are not necessarily the same as Borough or constituency boundaries. I have, therefore, provided information for the South West Thames District which deals with the Borough of Wandsworth in addition to other Boroughs.

Details of Social Fund budget allocations (grants and loans), and loan expenditure for the South West Thames District for the years 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 are shown in the table at Annex A.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Annex A

Social Fund budgets and loan expenditure for the south west thames district for each of the last three financial years

	Grant allocation £	Loan allocation £	Loan expenditure £
1991-92	819,740	1,877,056	1,877,055
1992-93	998,614	2,239,296	2,239,298
1993-94	1,046,985	2,551,123	2,551,120

HOME DEPARTMENT

Jury Service

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he will take to equalise the treatment of unemployed people or jury service with those who are in employment with regard to payment of expenses and national insurance contributions.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The regulations governing allowances for jurors' expenses, including national insurance contributions, have applied to those on jury service who are unemployed on the same basis as those in employment since they came into operation on 1 January 1979.

Police Dogs

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proposals he has for the use of police dogs to aid in the identification of suspects on parades; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will commission research into the use of dogs in other countries for the purposes of identifying criminals at identification parades; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Any results obtained from using police dogs to identify suspects at identification parades would be of doubtful evidential value and I have no plans to encourage further work in this area.

Prisoners (Transfer)

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the extent to which the recommendations and undertakings made in the then Minister of State's statement of 23 November 1992, Official Report, columns 481-82, regarding temporary transfers of Irish prisoners to prisons in Northern Ireland have not yet been implemented, and the reasons for this;

(2) if he will make a statement on the reasons why prisoners' requests lodged with the Home Office since November 1992 for transfer to prison establishments in Northern Ireland have yet to be decided;

(3) how many requests for transfers to prisons in Northern Ireland have been lodged with the Home Office in each of the last five years; and how many have been granted, refused or are undecided.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 23 November 1992, the Government accepted the recommendation made by an interdepartmental working group on the transfer of prisoners that prisoners refused a permanent transfer to another United Kingdom jurisdiction should be considered for a extended temporary transfer. Implementation of this recommendation has been delayed because of subsequent concerns about the legal position.

The information requested on the number of requests made by prisoners to transfer to Northern Ireland and the outcome of these is given in the table.

Requests made by prisoners to transfer to Northern Ireland

Prison Births

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) male foreign nationals and (b) female foreign nationals were born in prison in England and Wales at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the numbers of (a) male foreign nationals and (b) female foreign nationals born in prison in England at the latest available date.

As you will know from the Director General's letter to you of 4 May, it is not usual for women serving a sentence of imprisonment to give birth in prison. Of 691 births to women who were serving a prison sentence in the last ten years only six were born in prison.

I am afraid that we do not keep records of the nationality of children born to imprisoned mothers. I understand that those born before 1 January 1983 in this country would have been British by their birth here but after that time their nationality would depend on the nationality of their mother or father and/or their parents' immigration status at the time of the birth.

Prison Visits

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average distance travelled by relatives visiting inmates in training prisons at the latest available date;

(2) what is the average distance travelled by relatives visiting inmates in women's prisons at the latest available date for which figures are available;

(3) what is the average distance travelled by relatives visiting inmates in closed young offender institutions at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about the average distances travelled by relatives visiting inmates in closed young offender institutions; women's prisons; and training prisons.

No information is held centrally on the distances travelled by relatives visiting inmates in these establishments. However, the National Prison Survey conducted in January and February 1991, asked prisoners who had received a visit from family or friends in the three months before interview, how far their most important visitor had had to travel to visit them. The average distance travelled by all most important visitors who were relatives visiting inmates in:

	Miles
Closed young offender institutions[1]	75
Women's prisons	62
Training prisons[1]	82

[1] Includes visitors to both male and female prisoners.

Drug Offences

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of (a) male foreign nationals and (b) female foreign nationals in prison were convicted of drug offences at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking what percentage of male foreign nationals and female foreign nationals in prison were convicted of drug offences at the latest available date.

On 31 March 1994 in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales 30 per cent. of sentenced male foreign nationals (excluding fine defaulters) were recorded centrally as being under sentence for drugs offences. The equivalent female percentage was 69 per cent.

Immigration

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Ghazanfar Ali Raja, IMP A3 6383 4/6, PO 24915/93, currently in Germany, has been told by a letter from Her Majesty's consulate general in Düsseldorf that no decision on his application to join his wife, Mrs. Carde Raja, a British citizen, of 145 High street, Linlithgow, can be made before a period of six to 12 months has elapsed.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how his Department will assess whether the marriage of an European economic area national is one of convenience; and how an European economic area national whose marriage is alleged to be one of convenience will be able to challenge or appeal against that assessment.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Where there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that a marriage between a European Economic Area national and a non-EEA national is one of convenience for immigration purposes, further inquiries will be made before deciding the application. The determining factor will be the intention of the couple to live permanently together as man and wife in a settled and genuine relationship.

An EEA national has a right of appeal against refusal of a residence permit.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications either for entry clearance or for leave to remain have been received in respect of the third country national family members of British citizens who have exercised rights under articles 48, 52 and 59 of the EC treaty in another EU member state in each year since the decision of the European Court of Justice in the case of Surinder Singh.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Since the judgment of the European Court of Justice in the case of Surinder Singh (C370/90) in July 1992, a total of 29 entry clearance applications have been made, at British diplomatic posts abroad, by persons who are not European Economic Area nationals and who have sought entry as family members of British citizens who have exercised treaty rights in another member state.

Of these applications, eight were made in 1992; 19 were made in 1993; and two have been made so far in 1994.

Information is not available on the number of applications made for leave to remain by such persons.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances he departs from recommendations from immigration adjudicators; whether there is any variation in practice in relation to recommendations from appeals against deportation with a restricted appeal right; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: It is the normal policy to accept adjudicators' recommendations unless to do so would be unreasonable or inconsistent, or would undermine general policy. There is no variation in the application of this policy as between one type of appeal and another.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether non-visa, non-European Economic Area national family members of European economic area nationals established in the United Kingdom will be required to hold European Economic Area family permits to be granted entry.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Under the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994, family members of a European Economic Area national who are not themselves EEA nationals and who seek admission to install themselves in the United Kingdom on a permanent or semi-permanent basis with the EEA national will need to hold an EEA family permit.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of the Union have exercised their rights under articles 48, 52 and 59 of the EC treaty in each of the last five years to apply for entry clearance or leave to remain for their third country national spouses and other family members to join or remain with them in the United Kingdom; and how many of these applicants have been interviewed about the circumstances of their marriage or other family relationship in each year.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information is not available in the form requested. However, since March 1993 a total of 1,965 after entry applications were received—1,275 in 1993, 690 so far in 1994—from non-European Economic Area nationals for residence documents of both limited and unlimited validity as the spouse, or other family member, of an EEA national exercising a treaty right in the United Kingdom. In 39 applications involving marriage—23 in 1993, 16 so far in 1994—an interview was carried out.

Yemen

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what plans Her Majesty's Government has to offer sanctuary to non-Yemeni nationals resident in the Yemen who are forced to flee due to the civil war but whose travel documents do not confer a right of settlement elsewhere.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None, but we are keeping the situation in the Yemen under review.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of applications for leave to remain or entry clearance have been refused to the third country national family members of citizens of the Union exercising free movement rights in the United Kingdom in accordance with the treaties in each of the past five years.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information is not available in the form requested. However of 1,251 applications received since March 1993 from non-European Economic Area nationals for residence documents of limited validity as the family member of an EEA national, 44 have been refused.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what measures have been put in place or are being put in place to give effect to the right under article 52 of the European Community treaty of companies and other legal persons to establish themselves in business in the United Kingdom deploying such staff as the company considers best able to fulfil its requirements irrespective of the nationality of the staff;

(2) how the Government have discharged their obligations under article 54(3)(f) of the EC treaty and the abolition of restrictions on freedom of establishment both as regards the conditions for setting up agencies, branches or subsidiaries in the United Kingdom and as regards the conditions governing the entry of personnel, including personnel not holding the citizenship of a member state or an European economic area state, belonging to the main establishment into managerial or supervisory posts in such agencies, branches or subsidiaries.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Following completion of the single market and implementation of the European Economic Area agreement, EEA nationals or companies may establish themselves here for business purposes including setting up agencies, branches or subsidiaries, under the same terms as United Kingdom businesses. EEA nationals have the right to enter the United Kingdom simply on production of a valid EEA passport or identity card and to work here in any capacity. Non-EEA nationals who wish to take up employment in the United Kingdom must satisfy the requirements of the immigration rules.

Prisoners (Mental Health)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in England and Wales received some form of mental health care in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how many prisoners in England and Wales received some form of mental health care in each of the last five years.

This information is not available in the form requested. However, Prison Service medical officers carry out medical monitoring at regular intervals within their establishments. The most up to date information held centrally is for February 1994 and is set out in the table below with comparative figures for the two previous years.

	February 1994	February 1993	February 1992
Mentally disordered prisoners awaiting transfer to hospital	136	123	92
Mentally disordered prisoners being treated in prison health care centres	802	415	671
Other prisoners requiring mental health care	1,766	2,343	1,515

Electoral Procedures

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from electoral administrators about the rules requiring verification of unused ballot papers at a count; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My officials have received two representations from electoral administrators on this matter since June 1990. But my right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to propose a change to the rules.

Prisons (Listener Schemes)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons in England and Wales listener schemes are in operation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking in which prisons in England and Wales listener schemes are in operation.

Prisons (Substance Abuse)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in which prisons in England and Wales drug abuse programmes are available to prisoners; and how many prisoners (a) commenced and (b) completed the programme in each prison in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94;

(2) in which prisons in England and Wales alcohol abuse programmes are available to prisoners; and how many prisoners (a) commenced and (b) completed the programme in each prison in (i) 1992-92 and (ii) 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about drug abuse programmes in prisons in England and Wales.

The Prison Service does not collate statistics on drugs abuse programmes centrally. A wide range of drug treatments are available across the prison system carried out by a variety of prison staff, including medical officers, psychologists, probation officers and health care officers, and using a number of different approaches such as detoxification, behavioural treatment and counselling. The Prison Service is currently developing a strategy on drugs with the aim of bringing together the reduction of supply and reduction of demand for drugs in prison. As part of this developing strategy a survey of drug abuse programmes is currently being carried out. Of the 75 prisons so far surveyed 98·7 per cent. (74) of establishments provided some form of treatment or education programmes for prisoners with drug misuse problems and 96 per cent. (72) of establishments provided some form of treatment or education for prisoners with alcohol problems. The statistics showing the type of treatment programmes available to individual and groups of prisoners for drug treatment and alcohol treatment are provided in annex 1.

Sentencing

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of people sentenced in the courts received a) a custodial sentence and (b) a non-custodial sentence each month from January 1992 to the latest available date.

Mr. Maclean: Information on sentencing for both the magistrates court and the Crown Court for 1992 is given in tables A to C. 1993 data will not be available until the autumn. Data provided by the Lord Chancellor's Department for committals for trial at the Crown court are given in table D.

Prisons (Drug Testing)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost of the introduction of drug testing in prisons for the year 1994-95 and for each of the next four years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the estimated cost of drug testing in prisons.

It is not possible at this stage to estimate the cost of drug testing over the next four or five years. This will depend on a number of factors, such as the number and frequency of tests, which will be addressed in pilot schemes which we plan to conduct later this year.

Obscene Publications Branch

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department , pursuant to his oral answer of 19 May, Official Report, column 941, (1) on what date he expects the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to complete his review of the structure of the obscene publications branch; and why reference to the existence of the obscene publications branch has been deleted from the 1994 edition of the Police and Constabulary Almanac official register;

(2) who took the decision to delete from the 1994 edition of the Police and Constabulary Almanac official register all mention of the obscene publications branch of the Metropolitan police;

(3) whether he was consulted about and informed of the decision to delete from the 1994 edition of the Police and Constabulary Almanac official register all mention of the obscene publications branch of the Metropolitan police; and whether this decision is consistent with his policy on the future of the branch.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand from the Commissioner that he expects to receive the final report of the restructuring review of specialist operations, which includes the obscene publications branch, in August.

The lack of a specific reference to the obscene publications branch in the 1994 edition of the Police and Constabulary Almanac is the result of an administrative oversight within the Metropolitan police. The error has been noted for correction.

Police Cells

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently held in police cells.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mrs. Roche, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how many prisoners are currently held in police cells.

On Monday 23 May, the latest date for which complete information is available, 130 prisoners were held in police cells.

Prisons (Anger Management Programmes)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons in England and Wales anger management programmes are available to prisoners; and how many prisoners (a) commenced and (b) completed the programme in each prison in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question to the Secretary of State for the Home Department about which prisons in England and Wales provide anger management programmes and the numbers of prisoners commencing and completing the programme in each prison.

Teams of tutors from the following establishments were trained to run the anger management programme as follows:

1. Between 1 April 1992 and 31 March 1993:

HMP Elmley
HMP Featherstone
HMP Frankland
HMP Highdown
HMP Leeds
HMP Long Lartin
HMP Manchester
HMP Risley

HMYOI Brinsford
HMYOI Bullwood Hall
HMYOI Dover
HMYOI Feltham
HMYOI Hollesley Bay
HMYOI Huntercombe
HMYOI Lancaster Farms
HMYOI Moorland
HMYOI Onley

2. Between 1 April 1993 and 31 March 1994:

HMP Albany
HMP Ashwell
HMP Belmarsh
HMP Birmingham
HMP Bullingdon
HMP Camp Hill
HMP Canterbury
HMP Coldingley
HMP Full Sutton
HMP Highpoint
HMP Lincoln
HMP Lindholme
HMP The Mount
HMP Nottingham
HMP Parkhurst
HMP Ranby
HMP Stocken
HMP Wakefield
HMP Wayland
HMP Wandsworth
HMP Whatton
HMP Woodhill
HMP Wormwood Scrubs

HMRC Reading

HMYOI Aylesbury
HMYOI Erlestoke
HMYOI Stoke Heath
HMYOI Swinfen Hall

The frequency of anger management programmes and numbers of prisoners attending in any given year are not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Fine Defaulters

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in England and Wales were serving sentences for fine defaults at the latest available date, given (a) as an absolute number and (b) as a percentage of the prison population, and broken down by gender.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking how many prisoners in England and Wales were serving sentences for fine defaults at the latest available date, given (a) as an absolute number and (b) as a percentage of the prison population, and broken down by gender.

On 31 March 1994 there were 585 fine defaulters (557 Males and 28 Females) held in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales. They accounted for 1·2 per cent. of the total prison population (including prisoners held in police cells). Male fine defaulters accounted for 1·2 per cent. of the male prison population; the equivalent female percentage was 1·6 per cent.

Murder Cases

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the matters referred to him by the hon. Member for Woolwich in respect of the Rolan Adams and Stephen Lawrence murder cases;

(2) what evidence he has seen to suggest that a police officer was involved in discrediting the evidence of an eye witness to the murder of Stephen Lawrence;

(3) what was the involvement with key witnesses in the Stephen Lawrence and Rolan Adams murder cases of the police officer whose name has been supplied to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner that he is considering information which has been supplied to him in connection with the matter referred to by the hon. Member.

Deportation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to publish reports of investigating officers into complaints about excessive force by the employees of private security firms during deportations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No. It is not normal practice to publish investigating officers' reports.

Prisoners' Compacts

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons in England and Wales prisoners' compacts are in operation; what is the procedure by which the content of the individual compact is decided; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking which prisons in England and Wales prisoners' compacts are in operation; what is the procedure by which the content of the individual compact is decided; and if he will make a statement.

Listed below are those establishments which, in June 1993, the latest date for which the information is available, were operating prisoners' compacts:

Blantyre House
Brinsford
Bristol (Pilot scheme in one wing)
Canterbury (Unconvicted wing and Resettlement wing)
Cardiff (Remand wing)
Deerbolt (Pilot scheme)
Drake Hall
Erlestoke (Education Department)
Haslar
Kirklevington Grange
Leyhill
Lindholme (One wing)
Low Newton
Manchester (Education Department)
Moorland
Swinfen Hall
Thorn Cross
Thorpe Arch
Werrington
Wetherby

Compacts were also being experimented with at the following establishments:

Bullwood Hall
Downview
Frankland
Hull
Latchmere House
Morton Hall
North Sea Camp
Norwich
Rudgate
Swaleside
Usk/Prescoed
Wakefield
Whitemoor
Wolds

The procedure by which the content of the individual compact is decided is a matter for the governor of the establishment concerned, taking account of advice which was issued in December 1993. This set out a model prisoner compact and advice on developing a compact locally.

Prison Suicides

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) male and (b) female suicides there were in prisons in 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how many (a) male and (b) female suicides there were in prisons in 1993-94.

The information is shown in the table below:

Year	Male	female

Prisons (Cognitive Skills Programmes)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons in England and Wales cognitive skills programmes are available to prisoners; and how many prisoners (a) commenced and (b) completed the programme in each prison in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about which prisons in England and Wales provide cognitive skills programmes and the numbers of prisoners commencing and completing the programme in each prison.

The centrally managed cognitive skills programme was introduced in the financial year 1993-94. Pilot programmes were introduced in 11 establishments.

1. Piloting Reasoning and Rehabilitation cognitive skills programme:
   HMYOI Aylesbury
   HMYOI Brinsford
   HMYOI Full Sutton
   HMYOI Glen Parva
   HMYOI Grendon
   HMP Holloway
   HMYOI Lancaster Farms
   HMP Leyhill
   HMYOI Swinfen Hall
2. Piloting In-house cognitive skills programme:
   HMYOI Lancaster Farms
   HMP Wakefield
   HMP Wandsworth

3. Prisoners completing the programme 1993-94 are as follows:

Prisoners (AIDS)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 161, to what extent doctors in the prison service are expected to take into account the risk of the AIDS virus being spread by the sharing of heroin needles when deciding whether to prescribe methadone.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to what extent doctors in the prison service are expected to take into account the risk of the AIDS virus being spread by the sharing of heroin needles when deciding whether to prescribe methadone.

The decision on whether to prescribe methadone to prisoners is a clinical judgment at which prison medical officers are expected to arrive in the same way as medical practitioners do in the community outside prison. This means that they would take into account all the relevant factors including HIV and AIDS. Prison medical officers have the clinical freedom to prescribe pharmaceutically or otherwise to protect the health of individual prisoners. This has been made clear in all HIV/AIDS training in prisons and was recently reinforced by a letter from the Director of Health Care in the Prison Service in a letter to all prison doctors on the 18 May 1994. A copy of this letter is enclosed.

Following is the letter referred to in Mr. Butler's communication:

Dear Doctor

TRANSMISSION OF HIV WITHIN THE PRISON CONTEXT

The first recorded case of HIV transmission within the English Prison Service has been reported and confirmed. The transmission was by sexual contact. Cases of transmission reported from Glenochil Young Offender Centre in Scotland last year were caused by injecting with contaminated needles.

I draw this case to your attention to remind you of the need to continue to give high priority to HIV/AIDS awareness, and to have in place a strategy for the management of HIV/AIDS in your prison. All prisons should have HIV multi-disciplinary teams as outlined in Circular Instruction 30/1991. Following the completion of the 1993 Training Programme prisons should also have trained HIV counsellors and trained HIV care and support officers who are available to develop education programmes and offer advice to staff and prisoners. The multi-disciplinary teams need to consider contingency plans for HIV emergencies including outbreaks of HIV, hepatitis B or other infectious diseases related to HIV. The medical officers, trained counsellors and care and support officers must be able to provide support and advice if such an incident occurs in each prison.

Doctors have particular responsibility to communicate relavant medical information promptly to their medical colleagues both inside and outside of the Service. Where transmission of HIV occurring within the prison context is documented, it is important that this information is provided to the health care adviser and the Directorate of Health Care. The names of the infected individuals need not be divulged.

It is important that liaison between the doctor in the prison, the health care adviser and the Directorate is achieved in order that the most appropriate action is taken, and that any relevant questions which may be raised in the media or in Parliament can be dealt with appropriately.

Doctors have a responsibility to ensure that any person known to have HIV infection has access to regular medical monitoring (both clinical and laboratory). This is outlined in the Circular Instruction. Regular medical monitoring must include counselling on safer sexual behaviour and safer drugs use to minimise the risk of spread of HIV infection.

Doctors have the clinical freedom to prescribe pharmaceutically or otherwise to protect the health of individual prisoners. Legal advice is that doctors who so prescribe for their patients with appropriate advice, in the exercise of their clinical judgment, could expect protection in law for doing so.

Any queries about this DDL should be addressed to Dr. Robin Ilbert or Mr. L. Curran.

Sentences (Cost)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average cost per month of (a) keeping someone in prison and (b) sentencing someone to community-based penalties in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In 1992-93 the average monthly net operating cost per prisoner place was £2,019 and the cost of community sentences between £104 and £108.

In 1993-94 the average monthly cost of community sentences was between £106 and £110. Figures for the monthly net operating cost per prisoner place for 1993-94 are not yet available.

Restraint Use

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the ethnic origin of those (a) prison inmates and (b) persons in police custody on whom restraints were used during 1993.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Alun Michael, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking what was the ethnic origin of those (a) prison inmates and (b) persons in police custody on whom restraints were used during 1993.

I am afraid that the information is not available centrally.

Pre-sentence Reports

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations his Department has received regarding the proposal in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill to abolish the requirement for a pre-sentence report before imposing custody or a community sentence; and how many of those representations were in favour of abolition.

Mr. Maclean: Since this proposal was brought forward in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill, the Home Office has received 22 representations, all opposing it.

Prison Sanitation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison cells currently have access to sanitation; and what proportion this is of all prison cells.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of prison cells which have access to sanitation.

A significant number of prisoners are held in non cellular accommodation, in units which we describe as cubicular. A small number are held in dormitories, although this type of accommodation is being phased out. Our data, therefore, about work to achieve 100 per cent. access to sanitation is provided solely on the basis of prison places, without differentiating between cellular and non-cellular accommodation. Also, the programme is monitored in terms of work to be done.

At the end of April there were still just over 4,000 cells in use without access to sanitation. Some 700 of these are being modernised in the course of projects which are already underway and the remainder in projects which are scheduled to start between now and February 1996. 91 per cent. of prison places in use now have full time access to sanitation.

The Prison Service continues to give very high priority to the sanitation programme. Our aim is to ensure that at least 95 per cent. of prisoners have access to sanitation by the end of 1994/95 and that 100 per cent. is achieved by February 1996, in line with the recommendations of the Woolf report.

Sex Offenders (Treatment)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which prisons in England and Wales sex offender treatment programmes are available to prisoners; and how many prisoners (a) commenced and (b) completed the programme in each prison in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the availability of sex offender treatment programmes in prisons in England and Wales and the numbers of prisoners commencing and completing the programme in (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94.

The centrally managed sex offender treatment programme is now available in 17 adult male and one young offender male establishments.

Other prisons where locally managed programmes are in operation include HMP Grendon and HMP Wormwood Scrubs.

The number of prisoners having their treatment needs assessed and those completing treatment on the centrally managed programme is as shown in the attached table.

Prisons (Overcrowding)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps he is taking to deal with overcrowding in prisons; what assessment he has made of the effect of overcrowding on the safety of prison staff and prisoners; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what measures he is taking to deal with prison overcrowding; and what are his plans regarding the use of (a) police cells, (b) temporary buildings or portakabins and (c) prison ships or barges.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the measures being taken to deal with prison overcrowding and the use of police cells, temporary buildings and prison ships or barges; and also about the effect of overcrowding on staff and prisoner safety.

The majority of Prison Service establishments are not overcrowded. Despite the rise in the prison population, overcrowding has reduced markedly from the high levels of the late 1980s. In 1987-88, an average of over 5,000 prisoners shared three to a cell designed for one. By the end of March 1994, no prisoners were sharing in this way. In 1987-88, an average of nearly 13,400 prisoners shared two to a cell designed for one. By the end of March 1994 there were only 8,500.

To reduce overcrowding and maximise the use of available accommodation, sentenced prisoners are transferred as quickly as possible from local prisons and remand centres, where the population pressures are most acute, to training prisons and young offender institutions. In addition, some establishments have changed the type of prisoner they take to fit better with current needs and the court catchment areas of some local prisons and remand centres have been adjusted to equalise population pressures as far as possible. Further progress in reducing overcrowding will be made as additional accommodation at existing prisons and new places at new prisons come on stream.

Some use of police cells has been necessary in the North of England since the beginning of 1994. The number of prisoners held in police cells peaked at 540 in mid-March but had reduced to 130 on 23 May. If there is no unplanned loss of accommodation or exceptional surge in the prison population, the current use of police cells should end during June. Every effort will be made to avoid future use of police cells.

There are no present plans to use accommodation such as military camps or floating facilities, but some use of temporary buildings within prison establishments will continue to be made to enable progress with the building and refurbishment programme to continue.

Each establishment has an operational capacity which is set at the number of prisoners who can be held without serious risk to good order—including the safety of staff and prisoners—or to security and the proper running of the planned regime. It remains a top priority of the Prison Serice to ensure that the number of prisoners held in an establishment is kept within the establishment's operational capacity.

Prison Statistics

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the (a) certified normal accommodation, (b) operational activity and (c) actual population at each prison in England and Wales at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about Prison Service accommodation and population.

The attached table shows the certified normal accommodation (CNA), operational capacity and actual population in each establishment in England and Wales on 24 May 1994. A copy of the table has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

"Forbidden Knowledge"

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter dated 24 March from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North regarding the computer disc entitled "Forbidden Knowledge".

Mr. Maclean: I wrote to the hon. Member on 25 May 1994.

Parliamentary Boundaries

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the redistribution of parliamentary boundaries within the Greater London area.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no representations concerning the boundary commission's specific proposals for the Greater London area.

Young Offenders

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to introduce the penalties for young offenders that are contained in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill.

Mr. Maclean: The timetable for implementation will be substantially dependent on the progress of the Bill in Parliament and is likely to be different in respect of the Bill's provisions relating to different sentences. For example, the timing of the introduction of the new secure training order for 12 to 14-year-old persistent offenders will be dependent also on the availability of the new secure accommodation for which the Bill makes provision. It is the Government's firm intention that all the Bill's provisions on sentencing young offenders should be in force as soon as possible after Royal Assent, but at this stage, it would be premature to set firm implementation dates.

Fire Safety

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the final report of the fire safety scrutiny team.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to receive the report from the scrutiny team very shortly. Thereafter he will be considering along with my right hon. Friends, the President of the Board of Trade, the Secretary of State for Employment and the Secretary of State for the Environment, how best to take things forward.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations have taken place between his officials and the construction industry task force on fire legislation and enforcement; which officials were involved in the consultations; and what specific reference has been made to these consultations in documents published or placed in the Library.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There were no formal consultations between my officials and the construction industry task force on fire legislation and enforcement. However, Mr. R. J. Miles and Mr. A. N. Pickersgill of the fire safety division did meet two members of the task force and officials from the Department of Trade and Industry on 5 July 1993 when preliminary deregulatory ideas were raised.

There were no further meetings between members of the fire safety division and the task force; and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade published the latter's proposals in January 1994. No reference to meetings with officials were made in that document or in the task force's working papers which were placed in the Library on 30 March 1994.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he published his departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and to whom it has been made available.

Mr. Howard: Copies of the guidance notes on the arrangements to implement the code of practice on government information in the Home Office were placed in the Library of the House on 16 May. The campaign for freedom of information has been sent a copy, at its request. Copies are available to the general public from the publications unit of the Home Office information and library services on request.

Pet Identification

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what analysis the Government have undertaken into forms of identification for pets.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Government considered different forms of identification for dogs, prior to the introduction of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

Prisoners (Cost)

Mr. Marland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost per week of maintaining a prisoner in gaol.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Paul Marland, dated 26 May 1994:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the average cost per week of maintaining a prisoner in jail.

In 1992-93 the average weekly net operating cost per prisoner place in England and Wales was £466.

Police Management Reorganisation

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what management reorganisation plans are being considered by police authorities and constabularies; and if he will list the constabularies, the nature of the plans involved and the effect on police establishments, plus supernumeraries, in each case.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Some two thirds of forces are understood to have reorganised into locally managed, basic command units based on a single-tier management structure. Most other forces have completed, or are undertaking, reviews of their structure and organisation. Details of the nature of individual force restructuring plans and the effects on establishment levels are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Special Police Protection

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what grounds he refused the Gloucestershire police force request for additional resources to protect (a) the Prince of Wales's Highgrove house, (b) the Princess Royal's Gatcombe Park and (c) the home of Prince and Princess Michael of Kent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Pornography

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the importance of the work of the obscene publications squad in combating (a) computer pornography, (b) child pornography and (c) sadistic pornography.

Mr. Maclean: The Government fully acknowledge the important work that the obscene publications squad does in combating all kinds of pornography. We have been assured by the Commissioner that the Metropolitan police will continue this work, whatever the outcome of his current restructuring exercise.

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Howard: Parliamentary Counsel does not draft on behalf of private Members, but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. With the authority of Ministers, amendments were drafted by Parliamentary Counsel on instructions from Departments and subsequently passed to private Members in 1993 in respect of the Local Government (Amendment) and the Bail (Amendment) Bills.

Registrars of Births, Deaths and Marriages

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors led to the imposition of the age limit for the appointment of registrars of births, deaths and marriages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: I have been asked to reply.

Generally, the statutory age restrictions for appointment as registrar of births, deaths and marriages are 21 years minimum and 65 years maximum. The minimum age restriction was set to reflect the special personal responsibilities and liabilities which accompany statutory office of registrar and the sensitivity of the duties. The upper limit is related to the normal retirement age for men but may be waived if there is no other suitable candidate for appointment.

British Passport (Mr. A. Jordan)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the current status of a British passport in the name of Mr. A. Jordan, born in Reading on 1 November 1963.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd [holding answer 23 May 1994]: There is no record of a British passport being issued to a Mr. A. Jordan, born in Reading on 1 November 1963.

TRANSPORT

A19 (Emergency Telephones)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to commence on providing emergency telephones on that stretch of the A19 from Teesside to the Tyne tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Subject to the availability of funds, work is expected to commence on providing emergency telephones on the A19 between Stockton-on-Tees and the Tyne tunnel during the 1995-96 financial year.

Rail Freight

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress since 1 January 1993 of measures to encourage and facilitate more freight to be transported by rail.

Mr. Freeman: We have liberalised access to the rail network, facilitated the restructuring of BR's freight businesses as a prelude to privatisation, improved the freight facilities grants scheme, introduced a new track access grant for marginal freight flows and raised the maximum gross vehicle weight limit to 44 tonnes for suitably configured six-axle lorries engaged in combined road/rail transport.

Diesel-powered Vehicles

Mr. Jonathan Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many diesel-powered vehicles are currently licensed by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.

Mr. Key: The latest available figures, for end December 1993, estimate total licensed stock to be 24·8 million vehicles, of which 3·2 million are recorded as being diesel powered.

London Transport

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has set quality of service objectives for London Underground Ltd. and London Transport bus services.

Mr. Norris: I have today written to the chairman of London Transport setting quality of service objectives for London Underground Ltd. and London Transport bus services. Copies of my letters have been placed in the Library of the House.

Roads

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will arrange for the reprinting of the report by the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment, on "Assessing the Environmental Impact of Road Schemes";

(2) when the findings of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment concerning the traffic-generating potential of road building will be published.

Mr. Key: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 20 May 1994, Official Report, columns 596 and 599.

Birmingham Northern Relief Road

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the report to the inspector of the 1988 public inquiry into the Birmingham northern relief road was made available to which bidders for the concession to build a privately financed motorway.

Mr. Key: No, the inspector's report was not made available to any of the bidders for this concession.

Office of Passenger Rail Franchising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 600, if he will provide separate dates and participants for each future meeting to be held, for all dates which have been booked, between Shandwick Consultants and (a) the franchising director, (b) officials from Opraf and (c) officials from his Department.

Mr. Freeman: Both the Franchising Director and officials from Opraf, and the Department will meet from time to time with Shandwick to discuss and review their work programme.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answers of 20 May, Official Report, column 600, and his answer to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), what is his estimate of the total amount, inclusive of value-added tax, which his Department will have paid to Dewe Rogerson for advice on his Department's marketing strategy for rail privatisation by the time Dewe Rogerson's contract has been completed; what element of this total arises from his Department's decision to terminate the contract between his Department and Dewe Rogerson; on what date Dewe Rogerson was informed of his Department's decision to terminate the contract; and what length of notice was stipulated for either party under the contract.

Mr. Freeman: The answers are:

(a) It is not possible to provide a figure for the total amount until Dewe Rogerson's work is finally completed and their final invoice submitted for payment.

(b) None.

(c) 12 May 1994.

(d) The contract provided for termination by the Department giving three months' notice in writing.

Trans-European Road Network

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the trans-European road routes from the island of Ireland to Europe.

Mr. Key: The trans-European road network was agreed by the Council of the European Communities on 29 October 1993—council decision 93/629/EEC. I have placed in the Library a copy of the map showing the currently agreed network in the United Kingdom, which includes the routes to Ireland. Amendments to the network are under consideration, including the removal of the east-west route from Stansted to Oxford following its withdrawal from the national road programme.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what submissions he has made under the trans-European road network programme; and what consultations he has carried out.

Mr. Key: Revisions to the trans-European road network are being progressed as part of the new rules for trans-European transport networks that are required to be in place by 1 July 1995. As part of our consideration of the network in England we have consulted local highway authorities and other interested bodies. Similar consultations have taken place in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. We have already asked that the following additions be made to the network in the United Kingdom:

—the M25 between junctions 3 and 5
—the M27 between Southampton and Portsmouth
—the M62 between the M6 and Liverpool
—the A465/A40 Heads of the Valleys route from the M4 near Swansea to Raglan
—the M8/A8 from Glasgow to Greenock
—the M77/A77 from Glasgow to Ayr.

The Commission has included those additions in its proposal on the trans-European transport networks of 28 March 1994. We are at present considering other suggested amendments to our part of the road network, and shall reach a decision soon on whether we shall pursue these.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what submissions he has made under (a) the trans-European conventional rail network programme and (b) the trans-European high-speed network programme; and what consultations he has carried out.

Mr. Freeman: The European Commission is shortly expected to bring forward proposals for the establishment of networks for high-speed passenger and conventional rail services. In assisting the Commission with the formulation of its proposals, we have consulted both British Rail and Railtrack, and will continue to do so as discussions proceed. Formal adoption of these and other EC network guidelines is not expected before the middle of next year.

Seat Belts

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will give a list of all new research commissioned by his Department for use in his review into the technical and cost implications of fitting seat belts to both minibuses and coaches; on what date and from which organisation such research was commissioned; if he will place copies of each separate piece of research in the Library; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will publish the full terms of reference given to those individuals and/or organisations invited to carry out his review into the technical and cost implications of fitting seat belts to both minibuses and coaches;

(3) on what date his review was established into the technical and cost implications of fitting seat belts to both minibuses and coaches; on what date a press notice or formal announcement was made of the establishment of this review; which outside individuals and organisations have been appointed to the body carrying out the review; how many meetings have been held by the body set up to carry out the review; and what is his estimate of the cost to date of carrying out the review.

Mr. Key: Officials were asked to review the full technical and cost implications of fitting seat belts to all seats in minibuses and coaches following the M2 accident, which occurred on 10 November.

I first announced to the House that the review was being undertaken in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring), on 29 November 1993, Official Report, column 346. The review made use of existing research and accident data and other industry information.

I have now received the report and hope to be able to announce the conclusions shortly.

EMPLOYMENT

Young Workers Directive

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the purpose of the young workers directive; under what clause of what treaty it is being introduced; and whether it is subject to unanimity or majority vote in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The draft directive seeks to regulate the working hours and other conditions of employment of young people aged under 18. It has been brought forward as a health and safety measure under article 118a of the treaty of Rome and is subject to qualified majority voting in the Council of Ministers.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what was the object of the four-year renewable opt-out to the provisions of the young workers directive initially secured by the United Kingdom; when this opt-out was removed by the European Parliament; and what was the vote in Parliament;

(2) what assessment he has made of the proposed young workers directive, as amended by the European Parliament, on the freedom to employ newspaper boys in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The opt-out, which can be renewed six years after the directive is adopted, means that the United Kingdom can continue to follow our existing controls on the hours of work of young people. Newspaper boys and girls will be free to continue to work as they do now. On 9 March 1994 the European Parliament voted by a majority of 275 to delete our opt-out, but it has not been removed because the Parliament can only suggest amendments for directives—such as this—introduced under article 118a of the treaty of Rome. The Council of Ministers will decide the final form of the directive.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if the removal of the British opt-out from provisions of the young workers directive is subject to the Maastricht treaty provisions in relation to the power of the Council to remove amendments made by the European Parliament; and what will be the effect of these Maastricht provisions.

(2) if he will take steps to inform (a) newspaper boys and (b) other young people about the effect of the Maastricht treaty provisions on their employment prospects.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The United Kingdom renewable opt-out has not been removed from the draft young workers directive which is not, in any event, affected by the treaty on European Union negotiated at Maastricht.

Consultants

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for each of the last five years, the cost to public funds of consultancy work provided by (a) KPMG Peat Marwick, (b) Touche Ross, (c) Price Waterhouse, (d) Ernst and Young, (e) CSL, (f) Prime, (g) Basis, (h) Theodore Goddard, (i) Dibb Lupton Broomhead, (j) Capita and (k) Shreeveport to his Department; and if he will list any other firms which have provided consultancy work and the costs to public funds for each of the last five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information in the form requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many disabled (a) men and (b) women living in the Greater London area were registered as unemployed at the most convenient date.

Miss Widdecombe: The labour force survey asks people of working age if they currently have a health problem or disability which limits the kind of paid work that they can do. Estimates based on answers to this question will include people with short-term health problems and disabilities as well as those registered as disabled.

The latest labour force survey estimates for summer 1993 show that there were 40,000 such men and 17,000 such women who were International Labour Organisation unemployed and living in Greater London.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many married women in employment have children of school age.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates from the labour force survey show there were 2,178,000 married women with children aged 5 to 15 in employment in Great Britain at autumn 1993.

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage of claimants unemployed who have been unemployed for at least 12 months in (a) the 20 electoral wards with the highest claimant unemployment rate in the United Kingdom and (b) the 20 electoral wards with the lowest claimant unemployment rate in the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: The smallest areas for which official unemployment rates are calculated are self-contained labour markets known as travel-to-work areas. Information at ward level relates only to the level of claimant unemployment and an analysis by duration is available for the months of January, April, July and October. Data are on the unadjusted basis and can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of people employed in the United Kingdom aerospace industry.

Miss Widdecombe: The latest reliable information is from the 1991 census of employment. In September 1991, there were 147,400 jobs in Great Britain in the aerospace equipment manufacturing and repairing industry—activity heading 3640 of the 1980 standard industrial classification.

Animal Transport and Slaughter

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to make compulsory the formal training of transporter drivers and slaughtermen in the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: There are no plans to make the formal training of transporter drivers compulsory. Requirements for the training of slaughtermen are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. There are already requirements for the training of poultry slaughtermen in the Slaughter of Poultry (Licenses and Specified Qualifications) Regulations 1991. A consultation document on the training of red meat slaughtermen was issued in December 1993; responses are being considered.

Modern Apprentices

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will allow 18-year-olds to enter the modern apprenticeship scheme.

Miss Widdecombe: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 24 May, Official Report, columns 197-267, 18-year-olds will be able, from 1995, to enter accelerated modern apprenticeships as described in the White Paper "Competitiveness: Helping Business to Win", Cm. 2563.

In addition, 18-year-olds will be eligible for the mainstream modern apprenticeship initiative if their entry to training has been delayed and the training provided is more appropriate to their needs.

ACAS

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to receive the annual report of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service report for 1993, which will be laid before both Houses of Parliament on Wednesday 1 June. Copies will then be available from the Vote Office. The report will be released to the public on Thursday 2 June.

Absenteeism

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers of days lost through absenteeism in the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 25 May 1994]: Figures for the number of days lost through unauthorised absence from work are not available.

PRIME MINISTER

Wena Hotels, Egypt

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make representations to President Mubarak, requesting the full and immediate implementation of the verdict of the Egyptian arbitration authorities in favour of the United Kingdom company Wena Hotels in respect of its dispute with the Egyptian hotel company.

The Prime Minister: There are two hotels involved in this dispute. The Egyptian arbitration committee last month awarded Wena Hotels compensation in respect of one hotel, but judgment is awaited for the second. The company remains in touch with the Egyptian authorities, with support from our embassy in Cairo.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others.

EC (Legislation)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the volume of legislation being proposed by the Commission.

The Prime Minister: We are still discussing the agenda for the Corfu European Council with our European Union partners. We will bear my hon. Friend's suggestion in mind. We welcome the continued downward trend in the number of proposals for principal legislation brought forward annually by the Commission, a trend which owes much to the efforts of the Government.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 185, when he expects the British Red Cross to have clarified the issues in respect of the health of the Iraqi people, with particular reference to water filters and water pumps.

The Prime Minister: The British Red Cross has, with its Dutch and German colleagues, been discussing with the European Community the possibility of a significant contribution to the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies' appeal. Once the amount of this contribution has been resolved, and the British Red Cross has clarified how successful the appeal has been, they expect to put a proposal to Her Majesty's Government. The timing of such a proposal is a matter for the British Red Cross.

Fascists

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will put a proposal before other heads of Governments of the European Union that a member country which has fascists in its Government be suspended from the Union.

The Prime Minister: No. All member states of the European Union have democratically elected Governments, and we work with them on that basis.

Malaysia

Mr. Byers: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 404, on what day in June 1988 the Malaysian Government were informed of his predecessor's wish to visit Malaysia.

The Prime Minister: On 29 June 1988.

Disabled People

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 10 May, Official Report, column 153, what estimate he has made of the cost of the proposed consultation exercise to investigate discrimination against disabled people; and if he will list those persons and organisations he intends to consult.

The Prime Minister: The Government will consult within six months on proposals to combat, not investigate, discrimination against disabled people. A wide range of organisations will be consulted, including those involving disabled people, employers and business more generally. The exact extent and cost of the consultation exercise will not be known until the proposals have been finalised.

Australia and Thailand

Mr. Byers: To ask the Prime Minister which Ministers travelled with his predecessor when she visited Australia and Thailand in August 1988.

The Prime Minister: During her visit to Australia and Thailand in August 1988, my right hon. and noble Friend was not accompanied by any Ministers.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Licensing Legislation

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) on what date he expects to respond to the review of licensing legislation in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what form his response to the review of licensing legislation in Northern Ireland will take; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what organisations have made representations on the review of licensing legislation in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Representations on those aspects of Northern Ireland's liquor licensing law which they wish to see changed have been received from the following:

North Down Petty Sessions
Philip Russell Ltd.
Banbridge District Council
Hamilton and Kirk Ltd.
Bass Ireland Ltd.
Stewarts
Wine and Spririt Association of Northern Ireland
Hastings Hotels Group Ltd.
Lisburn Borough Council
Royal Ulster Agricultural Society
Marks and Spencer
South Belfast Labour Party
North Down Borough Council
Strabane District Council
Ballymoney Borough Council
Federation of the Retail Licensed Trade Northern Ireland
Winemark
Hospitality Association of Northern Ireland
Down District Council
Guinness
Craigavon Borough Council
Derry City Council
Northern Ireland Tourist Board
Coleraine Borough Council
Cookstown District Council
Restauranteurs Association of Northern Ireland
Ards Borough Council
Northern Ireland Off-licensed Traders Association
The British Field Sports Society
The Queen's University of Belfast
The Law Society
The Lord's Day Observance Society

In addition, submissions were received from two individuals.

The requests for change, and their implications for the related review of the law on registered clubs, are being considered. Proposals for amending both the law on liquor licensing and on registered clubs will be contained in draft Orders in Counicl which will be published for consultation when both reviews have been completed.

Bone Cancer

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many cases of bone cancer per 100,000 population there have been in Northern Ireland in each year since 1970;

(2) how many cases of cancers of all types per 100,000 population there have been in Northern Ireland in each year since 1970.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is taken from the Cancer Registry for Northern Ireland and is set out in the table:

New notification of cancer per 100,000 population

Year	Bone cancers per 100,000 population	All cancers per 100,000 population
1970	1·78	285
1971	1·49	287
1972	1·17	272
1973	1·44	290
1974	1·44	288
1975	1·64	308
1976	1·77	307
1977	1·05	301
1978	1·71	296
1979	0·52	296
1980	1·44	306
1981	0·46	300
1982	0·78	317
1983	0·52	337
1984	0·90	321
1985	0·77	323
1986	0·77	335
1987	0·83	340
1988	1·14	372
1989	0·82	365
1990	1·07	380
1991	0·82	368

Notes

The Cancer Registry is estimated to hold notifications for about 60 per cent. of all new cancer cases.

1991 is the latest year for which information is currently available.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his latest estimate of the number of people claiming benefit fraudulently.

Mr. Ancram: In 1992-93, there were 3,967 cases of social security fraud detected involving savings of some £10·6 million which is 0·5 per cent., of the total amount of benefit paid. There is, however, no reliable estimate of the number of fraudulent claims not detected.

Unemployment

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the change in the level of unemployment since January 1993.

Mr. Tim Smith: Seasonally adjusted figures show that the level of unemployment has fallen by 6,600 since January 1993.

Inter-party Talks

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress made towards a resumption of the inter-party talks on the future of Northern Ireland.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the discussions he has had with the parties in Northern Ireland and the Irish Government relating to the constitutional future of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: Bilateral discussions are continuing with three of the four Northern Ireland parties on the same basis as previously. The two Governments are also working intensively on a framework to carry the process forward. Our aim is to return to multilateral talks involving the two Governments and all the parties at the earliest appropriate moment.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will arrange discussions with political leaders to facilitate the peace process.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I will continue to invite discussion on the prospects for a peaceful political settlement in Northern Ireland with leaders of the main constitutional parties. The Government believe that the three-stranded talks process provides the framework within which agreement is most likely to be reached.

Security

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in the Province.

Mr. Cyil D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

Sir John Wheeler: As at 25 May, 32 people have died this year as a result of terrorism in Northern Ireland, 13 in the last four weeks.

The security forces continue to oppose terrorism with unrelenting determination. So far this year, 171 people have been charged with terrorist-related offences, including 43 with murder or attempted murder.

Exclusion Orders

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he is taking to review the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 and the use of exclusion orders.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, including the use of exclusion orders, is the responsibilty of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the latest figures for crime in Northern Ireland.

Sir John Wheeler: The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary will shortly publish his annual report for 1993, which will show that there was a decrease of 1·9 per cent. in notifiable crimes recorded in 1993 when compared to 1992.

Family Planning

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on family planning services in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: Comprehensive family planning services are available free of charge throughout Northern Ireland.

Cross-border Co-operation

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of co-operation between United Kingdom and Republic of Ireland security forces.

Sir John Wheeler: Excellent co-operation between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Garda is achieving vital successes against the terrorists. The two Governments support them by continuing to review and refine security co-operation measures in response to the threat from terrorism.

News Reporting

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he next plans to meet representatives of the broadcasting industry in Northern Ireland to discuss their news reporting.

Sir John Wheeler: I frequently meet representatives of the broadcasting industry in Northern Ireland, as do my ministerial colleagues and officials; our discussions cover a range of issues of common interest. There is at present no fixed date for my next such meeting.

Activity Centres

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures his Department is taking to ensure the safety of children participating in activities at outdoor activity centres in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: All schools were circulated with detailed guidance on "Safety in Outdoor Education" in November 1989.

Northern Ireland is represented on the steering group, set up following the announcement on 11 November 1993 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education. This group will shortly be publishing further guidance in respect of safety in outdoor activity centres.

Child Care Training

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on future funding of the Northern Ireland Pre-School Playgroups Association training projects for women wishing to pursue a career in child care.

Mr. Tim Smith: Funding for Northern Ireland Pre-School Playgroups Association training projects includes a contribution from the European social fund. The negotiations with the European Commmission on the 1994-1999 Northern Ireland structural funds package, which includes European social fund measures, will not be completed for some weeks yet. The future of individual applications cannot be decided until the new programmes have been agreed.

Fair Employment Legislation

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the working of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989.

Mr. Tim Smith: Since the coming into operation of Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989, my predecessors and I have regularly met the chairman of the Fair Employment Commission to assess the implementation of the Act.

In addition, officials meet formally with the chief executive of the FEC every three months to review the full range of work being carried out by the Commission.

I am satisfied with the way the Act has been operating and am encouraged by the progress that has been made to date.

Job Creation

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new jobs were created in the last financial year by (a) inward investment and (b) local expansion; and what is the forecast for 1994-95.

Mr. Tim Smith: During the financial year 1993-94, 3,289 new jobs were created with assistance from the Industrial Development Board. Some 1,548 of these jobs were in foreign-owned and 1,741 in indigenous companies. Additionally, companies assisted by the Local Enterprise Development Unit created 5,890 new jobs during the calendar year 1993. I anticipate a similarly encouraging employment performance in 1994-95.

Bill of Rights

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received concerning the introduction and implementation of a Bill of Rights; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Over the past six months my Department has received representations about the introduction of a Bill of rights from the Ulster Unionist party, the Social Democratic and Labour party, the Liberal Democrats, the Workers Party, the National Peace Council and the Committee for the Administration of Justice. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights and the organisers of Initiative 92 have also expressed their continuing support for the idea.

The Government are ready in the context of the political talks involving the Irish Government and the main constitutional parties to consider the case for further enhancing the protection of human rights in Northern Ireland, including some form of entrenchment to provide additional, built-in safeguards against discrimination and disadvantage.

HEALTH

Direct Care Staff

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many direct care staff aged over 70 years are employed in each regional health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: Pursuant to my reply to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), Official Report, 24 March, column 415, a recent further check on the data about employees in this age band has shown it to be unreliable. The information requested is therefore not available.

Health Service Expenditure

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much is spent per capita on health services for residents in the (a) Doncaster, (b) Barnsley, (c) Rotherham, (d) Sheffield and (e) England as a whole; and what proportion is spent on treatment (i) in hospital and (ii) by community services, excluding the element cost which is attributable to medical education and research for the latest date she has figures available; and what were the figures (1) five and (2) 10 years ago.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head of population on hospital and community health service by district health authority in the last available year.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) today, which gave the latest available figures for all district health authorities and family health services authorities in England. It is not possible to break those figures down further into spend on hospital and community services, or to remove the cost element of medical education and research from the figures.

It is not possible to give per capita figures for earlier years on a comparable basis.

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from her Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Sackville: Parliamentary Counsel does not draft on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. With the authority of Ministers, amendments were drafted by Parliamentary Counsel on instructions from Departments and subsequently passed to private Members in respect of the Osteopaths Bill, the Medicines Information Bill and the Chiropractors Bill.

Cancer

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects the level of cancer specialists per head of population to attain that achieved by Portugal, Spain, the Netherlands, Germany, France and Norway.

Dr. Mawhinney: Comparisons with any international rates of cancer specialists per head of population are not appropriate since data may not always be recorded on the same basis. Neither is it appropriate to identify precise needs for numbers of consultants by specialty, because organisation of medical services varies between countries, and not all consultants in the relevant specialties treat cancer patients exclusively.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Darlington of 16 May, Official Report, column 318, if she will itemise the trusts in the Northern and Yorkshire region in 1991-92 and 1992-93 and state their contribution to the total regional surplus.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 318, if she will provide details of retained surpluses and deficits by individual trusts.

Mr. Sackville: The information will be placed in the Library.

Aborted Foetuses

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines her Department issues regarding the use of live aborted foetuses in scientific experiments;

(2) how many experiments on live aborted foetuses have been sanctioned by ethics committees since 1968.

Mr. Sackville: We are not aware of any experiments on live foetuses ex utero. Any research carried out on a foetus —that is, after termination under the Abortion Act 1967 —is subject to the principles set out in the report "Review of the Guidance on the Research Use of Fetuses and Fetal Material" (Cm. 762), known as the Polkinghorne report. The report's code of practice is reproduced in the guidance issued to local research ethics committees. It stresses that issues relating to research or other use of the live whole foetus must be considered in a manner broadly similar to the way such issues are considered for children and adults.

Deoxyribonucleic Acid

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation of the health implications of the location of the first European bank for deoxyribonucleic acid at Whitehaven has been conducted by her Department.

Mr. Sackville: There are no plans to evaluate the health implications of the location of the proposed bank for deoxyribonucleic acid at the Westlakes Research Institute at Whitehaven. Research undertaken following the establishment and subsequent use of this gene bank will be published in medical journals for peer review and comment.

Foetal Abnormality Survey

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to ensure that, following the restructuring of health authority regions, the work of the Northern regional health authority regional foetal abnormality survey office is replicated in all areas of the country in support of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for the regional health authorities concerned.

Health Services

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has had over local authorities taking over responsibility for commissioning health services.

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 11 January, Official Report, column 119.

Surcharging

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will consider introducing provisions to enable the surcharging of health authority members.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Public Bodies

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of members of (a) regional health authorities, (b) district health authorities, (c) family health service authorities and (d) trust boards are known to be members of patients' organisations;

(2) what proportion of members of (a) regional health authorities, (b) district health authorities, (c) family health service authorities and (d) trust boards are also members of local authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of members of (a) regional health authorities, (b) district health authorities, (c) family health service authorities and (d) trust boards are doctors, nurses or members of other health professions.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Patient Participating Groups

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patient participation groups are currently operating.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on patient participation groups is not available centrally.

Creutzfeldt Jakob Disease

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 322-23, what assessment has been made of evidence from Australia in respect of the transmission of Creutzfeldt Jakob disease through blood tranfusions.

Mr. Sackville: We understand that no evidence has been provided to the Australian authorities, despite several requests to support the claim associating Creutzfeldt Jakob disease and blood tranfusions.

Patient Co-operatives

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if her Department has evaluated overseas experience of patient co-operatives.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Vulvectomy and Lymph Node Removal

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if existing guidance to hospitals or clinicians allows for vulvectomy and lymph node removal to be carried out in the absence of biopsy reports.

Mr. Sackville: Clinical guidance is primarily the responsibility of the relevant professional bodies.

Patient Participation

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information her Department has on the experience of other countries in relation to patient participation.

Dr. Mawhinney: Departmental officials maintain awareness of initiatives involving patient participation in the United Kingdom and overseas to feed into policy development.

Nottinghamshire FHSA

Mr. Hoon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total funding for general medical services to Nottinghamshire family health services authority in 1993-94.

Mr. Sackville: Audited 1993-94 outturn data are not yet available.

AIDS Support Grant

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much each local authority has bid for AIDS support grant for 1994-95; and how much they were awarded.

Mr. SAckville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 26 April, Official Report, column 159. Details of the indicative and final allocations will be placed in the Library.

Consultancy Work

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each of the last five years, the cost to public funds of consultancy work provided by (a) KPMG Peat Marwick, (b) Touche Ross, (c) Price Waterhouse, (d) Ernst and Young, (e) CSL, (f) Prime, (g) Basis, (h) Theodore Goddard, (i) Dibb Lupton Broomhead, (j) Capita and (k) Shreeveport to her Department; and if she will list any other firms which have provided consultancy work and the costs to public funds for each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: For reasons of confidentiality, and in order to obtain value for money in the future, we are unable to list the specific costs of the consultancies concerned and the amounts paid as this would breach contractual agreements and jeopardise future value for money. The Department however, has spent the following amounts from running costs on consultancy since its establishment as a separate Department.

1990-91	£18,398,000
1991-92	£24,258,000
1992-93	£18,399,000
1993-94	£15,933,037

Information on national health service consultancy expenditure is not available centrally.

Continuing Care

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who determines where responsibility for funding continuing care arrangements for specific individuals lies; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: Under the new community care arrangements local and health authorities are required to agree their respective responsibilities for long-term care.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will issue new guidance on the provision of continuing care to clarify under what specific circumstances health authorities are expected to fund continuing care; and if she will make a statement.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to issue comprehensive guidance to health authorities and providers on the responsibility of the NHS to pay for continuing care.

Mr. Bowis: Under the community care arrangements local and health authorities were required to agree their respective resonsibilities for long-term care. The implementation of the community care arrangements has been carefully monitored. The need for any clarification of health and local authority responsibilities is being kept under review.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the responsibility of health authorities and local authorities when responsibility for funding continuing care is based upon reasons of ill health.

Mr. Bowis: The national health service is responsible for meeting needs for long-term healthcare. It is for local health purchasers to determine the level and type of services provided in the light of local needs, resources and clinical practice.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she published her departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and to whom it has been made available.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 29 April, Official Report, column 372.

Immunisation

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's policy on informing young people about their rights concerning immunisation; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Consent has to be obtained before any immunisation can be given.

The patients charter requires information to be given when treatment is proposed. In line with this, information prepared by the Health Education Authority, which is used by medical staff and provided to parents and teenagers, now contains more details about issues relevant to immunisation. The Health Education Authority produce a leaflet about rubella immunisation for distribution to teenage girls, copies of which will be placed in the Library. They are also developing leaflets for BCG immunisation and the soon to be introduced diphtheria/tetanus booster dose; this latter leaflet will also contain information about the school leavers polio booster dose.

Elderly People

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she plans to take on the report of the Royal College of Physicians, "Ensuring Equity and Quality of Care for Elderly People", a copy of which has been sent to her.

Mr. Bowis: This report is aimed primarily at professional national health service staff and managers. We welcome its publication as a further encouragement to high quality services for elderly people.

NHS Charters

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific form of compensation or redress is available under the provisions of the patients charter to (a) out-patients who have not been seen within specific appointment times and (b) patients for whom an operation is postponed twice, and yet are still not admitted within one month of the date of the second cancelled operation.

Dr. Mawhinney: Patients should be kept informed about the reasons for any delays or postponements in their treatment. A suitable apology should be offered in appropriate cases.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospitals have adopted a policy of admitting a patient (a) within one month of the cancellation of an operation and (b) within two months of a second cancelled operation.

Dr. Mawhinney: All hospitals are implementing the policy reflected in the improved patients charter national standard which came into effect on 1 April 1994.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many FHSA and general practitioner charters have now been issued; and if she will list them.

Dr. Mawhinney: Every family health services authority has issued a charter and information from purchasers indicates that 38 per cent. of general practitioners practices have issued or are planning to issue a charter. The names of the individual general practices with charters are not available centrally.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what situations patients on NHS treatment receive free from NHS hospitals (a) prescriptions including contact lenses and (b) use of equipment including nebulisers; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Contact lenses may be prescribed through the hospital eye service if the patient has a clinical need for them. Many patients are entitled to a hospital eye service voucher to cover the cost of lenses.

Where a consultant decides—taking account of resources, needs and clinical priorities locally—that a piece of equipment should be provided as part of the national health service treatment, it should be provided free of charge.

Clinical Psychology Services

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data are collected to inform the costing of general practice fundholders' contracts for clinical psychology services.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioner fundholders' budgets are based on previous treatment patterns in the practice, informed by local average treatment rates and local hospital prices. General practitioner fundholders are responsible for using their budget to purchase appropriate services to meet their patients' needs, including clinical psychology outpatient services.

Health Authorities

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district health authorities and family health services authorities currently share the same chief executive; and if she will list them.

Dr. Mawhinney: The list of district health authorities and family health services authorities with a joint chief executive has been placed in the Library.

Information Service

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many calls have been logged since the establishment of the national health freephone information service; and if she will give details of the guidelines issued to staff governing advice given to callers seeking to complain about national health service services.

Mr. Sackville: The national health information service freephone telephone number, 0800 665544, has received 201,128 calls in the period between launch in January 1993 to the end of April 1994. Each health information service has a copy of the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunal) Regulations 1992 and HSG(92)21, copies of which are available in the Library. These documents, along with information about local procedures, contain the essential information to enable health information service personnel to advise callers how to make a complaint.

Mr. Richard Hughes

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received about the case of Mr. Richard Hughes of 3 Erylmore road, Mossley Hill, Liverpool 18, concerning his removal from the practice list of his GP; what information will be disclosed to him as to the reasons for his removal; and what assessment she has made of the consistency of his treatment with her policy on the priority to be accorded to ex-service men with disabilities.

Dr. Mawhinney: The hon. Member wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 20 May 1994 about his constituent. He will receive a reply shortly.

Health Information

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health shops are currently under consideration; where they will be situated; and what are the projected costs.

Mr. Sackville: The national health service provides information to the public in many ways—nationally, through the national health information service, community health councils, family health services authorities and district health authorities. Decisions about drop-in health information centres are taken at a local level to address local need.

Smoking

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the oral statement by the Minister for Health of 11 February, Official Report, column 607, what is the timetable for launching the £12 million three-year anti-smoking advertising programme.

Dr. Mawhinney: Later this year.

Dental Practices

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS dental service practices there are in each health authority area at the latest date for which figures were available; and what were the comparative figures in (a) April 1992 and (b) June 1987.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Adoption

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her Department's policy on whether children who cannot live with their own family should have a choice about the language and culture of the family who adopt them.

Mr. Bowis: Under legislation, courts and adoption agencies are required so far as practicable to ascertain the wishes and feelings of the child and give due consideration to them, having regard to the child's age and understanding. This would include the language and culture of his proposed adoptive family.

Children Act 1989

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, when the second report to Parliament on the Children Act 1989 will be published.

Mr. Bowis: I am pleased to announce that my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have laid before Parliament the second joint report to Parliament on the Children Act operation in England and Wales. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

The report gives an overview of the progress made and focuses on a wide range of issues. It is an encouraging picture confirming that the numbers of children looked after by local authorities, and on a child protection register continue to decline as local authorities respond positively to the intention of the Act that wherever possible children should remain at home with their families.

Rural Stress

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what specific measures she plans to take to aid in drawing farmers' attention to the help networks currently available to deal with rural stress and suicide; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: Over the last year, this Department has helped to finance initiatives in rural areas to increase awareness of suicide and the sources of help that are available. The Department has made a grant of £50,000 per annum over three years from 1994-95 to help support the Samaritans' outreach programme, part of which will be focused on rural areas and agriculture. The Department also supported a conference on rural stress, entitled "Rural Stress—Positive Action in Partnership", which took place earlier this year.

Children at Risk

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances local authority social services departments may leave children on the at risk register without an assigned social worker.

Mr. Bowis: A named key worker shall be appointed for every child who is placed on the child protection register and for whom there is an inter-agency protection plan. Where there is no current named key worker for a child on the register, it is for the local authority to ensure that arrangements are made for the protection plan to be implemented and a key worker appointed.

Women-only Wards

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the policy of her Department in respect of allowing women when in an NHS hospital to be treated in a women-only ward if that is their wish.

Dr. Mawhinney: District health authorities and general practitioner fundholders are expected to assess the needs of the populations they serve in reaching purchasing decisions, and to reflect these in their contracts with hospitals. The privacy and dignity of all patients is assured through the patients charter, and hospitals should take account of patients' wishes wherever it is practicable to do so.

Eye and Dental Tests

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what would be the cost to public funds of reintroducing (a) free eye tests and (b) free dental check-ups.

Dr. Mawhinney: Assuming that these changes led to no increase in the number of sight tests or dental examinations, each would cost some £60 million in a full year.

Foreign Patients

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many fee-paying patients from outside the United Kingdom received treatment in NHS hospitals in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for individual trusts and health authorities.

Private Hospital Beds

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many NHS beds have been converted to use by private patients in each of the last three years;

(2) how many NHS hospital trusts have had private patient units or wings in each of the last three years.

Mr. Sackville: These are local matters about which the Department does not collect information.

Nursery Education

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her Department's latest estimate of the number of places for under five-year-olds provided by (a) local authority day nurseries, (b) private day nurseries, (c) pre-school play groups and (d) child minders.

Mr. Bowis: I announced yesterday that it is estimated that, at 31 March 1993, there were 21,400 places in local authority day nurseries; 111,000 places in registered day nurseries; 396,900 places in pre-school play groups and 283,000 registered child minder places available[1] for use by the under fives.

[1] Following implementation of the Children Act 1989, information about places with childminders has been collected for children aged under eight.

Maternity Units

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list all the maternity units in England; and what were the total numbers of deliveries in each case, for each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Sackville: A list of national health service trusts, directly managed units and special health authorities in England with maternity facilities, with the number of maternity beds in each, will be placed in the Library. Information on the number of deliveries in each could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Health Visitors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been issued to health authorities with regard to ensuring health visitor coverage in areas where local authorities fail to provide social work cover for all children on the at risk register.

Mr. Bowis: Government guidance requires each health authority to identify a senior nurse with a health visiting qualification to act as the co-ordinator of all aspects of child protection work in their district. Among their key activities is the setting up of an effective communication system with managers and practitioners in other disciplines and agencies, to ensure a regular update about work load, staffing, emergencies and individual cases.

Clinical Services

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made as to which clinical services are not suitable to be contracted out of the NHS.

Mr. Sackville: It is for trusts, general practitioner fundholders and health authorities to determine the most appropriate options for the provision of services, including clinical services. Decisions are made on the basis of which source of provision, be it national health service, non-NHS or a combination of both, will provide the best quality of service for patients and cost effective use of NHS resources.

NHS Staff

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has concerning the number of employees aged over 70 years who are currently allowed to continue to work within the national health service.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 24 March 1994, c. 415]: I regret that misleading information was given in my previous reply. Information submitted to the Department on the age of national health service staff under 20 and over 65 has been found to be inaccurate. The Department does not therefore hold reliable information about employees aged over 70 years.

Expenditure

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) of 12 April, Official Report, column 72, if she will give the figures for expenditure per capita for London for (a) district health authorities and (b) family health services authorities, including expenditure by the London postgraduate hospitals and special health authorities.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much is spent per capita by London district health authorities on health services and special health authorities for residents of (i) inner London and (ii) outer London and what is the national average expenditure per capita by district health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 21 April 1994, c. 664-65]: I regret that, because of typographical errors, my previous reply needs to be amended. The following table gives the correct figures:

	District health authority spend		DHA spend including special health authorities
	Expenditure per capita £	Percentage above national average	Expenditure per capita £	Percentage above national average
Inner	553	47	603	57
Outer	398	6	415	8
Total London	460	22	490	28
Total England	376	—	384	—

Notes:

1. Inner London defined as in the report of the Enquiry into London's Health Services, Medical Education and Research (Tomlinson report).
2. SHA 1992-93 expenditure apportioned to DHAs based on analysis of district of residence of 1993-94 referrals.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the size of surpluses generated by trusts in each year since 1990-91, by region.

Mr. Sackville [pursuant to his reply, 16 May 1994, cols. 317-18]: I regret that there were errors in my previous reply. An amended table follows.

Region	Retained Surplus/(Deficit)
Northern	2,896	5,427
Yorkshire	3,100	2,962
Trent	153	4,622
East Anglian	1,075	533
North West Thames	6,145	17,220
North East Thames	7,249	13,165
South East Thames	1,082	9,597
South West Thames	5,303	4,001
Wessex	1,342	3,903
South Western	14,531	11,436
Oxford	104	4,356
West Midlands	2,932	4,177
Mersey	2,194	(749)
North Western	50	6,952

Notes to table:

1. Source: Audited accounts of NHS Trusts 1991-92 and 1992-93.
2. The figures for 1992-93 are provisional, being subject to National Audit Office review.
3. Surplus/(Deficit) is after interest, dividend payable on public dividend capital, extraordinary and exceptional items.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) of 12 April, Official Report, column 72, if she will provide comparable per capita spending figures for each (a) district health authority and (b) family health services authority in England.

Dr. Mawhinney: The per capita spend (by crude population) in 1992-93 for district health authorities and family health services authorities in England will be placed in the Library. Comparisons of these per capita spend figures need to be treated with caution. First, not all the expenditure covered arises from population related activities. Secondly, crude populations do not reflect differences in age structure or relative health care need. These differences feature in the formulae used to inform the main allocations made to DHAs.

TREASURY

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Sir John Cope: Parliamentary Counsel drafts not on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. No amendments to private Members' Bills were drafted by Parliamentary Counsel on instructions from Treasury Ministers and subsequently passed to private Members.

Diesel Fuel Excise Duty

Mr. Jonathan Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he is taking to enforce compliance with excise duties on diesel fuel in respect of diesel-powered vehicles on public roads.

Sir John Cope: Responsibility for the control of the illegal use of hydrocarbon oil which has not borne the full rate of excise duty is assigned to Customs and Excise. Control is carried out by 17 regional road fuel testing units, using mobile testing vehicles. Customs officers have the power to test the fuel of stationary diesel vehicles and by a series of simple visual and chemical tests can detect the presence of rebated diesel in the fuel tank of a vehicle.

Beer

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the most recent annual figures available for net (a) value added tax receipts and (b) excise receipts from beer.

Sir John Cope: In the calendar year 1993 (a) net VAT receipts from beer were around £1,600 million and (b) net excise receipts from beer were £2,230 million.

Paymaster General (Targets)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what key targets have been set for the office of Her Majesty's Paymaster General in 1994-95.

Sir John Cope: I have set demanding targets for the office of HM Paymaster General in 1994-95, but some details are commercially sensitive, The main features are:

Recovering Full Costs

1. recover through charges the full cost of running the Agency.

Reduction in Unit Costs

2. achieve at least a 3 per cent. reduction in real terms in the unit cost of paying a pension.

3. achieve a 3 per cent. improvement in the average unit cost index for banking transactions[1].

MEETING CUSTOMER REQUIREMENTS

Pensions

4. meet various targets for responding to correspondence and processing instructions in accordance with Service Level Agreements with individual customers.

5. meet quality targets in accordance with Service Level Agreements with individual customers.

Banking

6. meet transaction timetables in accordance with Service Level Agreements with individual customers.

7. meet quality targets for processing transactions in accordance with Service Level Agreements with individual customers.

Apex

8. meet the agreed timetable for sending financial information to the Treasury 95 per cent. of the time, and never exceed the timetable by more than 1 day.

[1] Banking transactions will be weighted as appropriate.

Building Societies Commission

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the court case involving the Cheltenham and Gloucester building society and the Building Societies Commission.

Mr. Nelson: The High Court is currently considering whether the details of Lloyds bank's scheme to take over the Cheltenham and Gloucester building society—including the payment of cash to Cheltenham and Gloucester members of less than two years' standing—are in conformity with the Building Societies Act 1986. It would be inappropriate for me to comment further on those issues until the Court has reached a decision.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Environmentally Sensitive Area Grants

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest uptake figures of the option to farmers to take the environmentally sensitive area grants in each area concerned, with the percentage of those eligible, together with the likely average payment to each farmer.

Mr. Jack: The percentages of eligible land under agreement or application and the average cost per agreement for the 22 English ESAs are given in the table. The number of farmers eligible for participation in each ESA scheme is not available.

ESA	Eligible Area (ha)	Percentage of eligible area under agreement or applied for as at 30 April 1994	Average payment per agreement £
Stage I
Broads[1]	24,000	63	3,430

Shropshire Hills	34,900	10	1,600
Upper Thames Tributaries[1]	18,000	2	5,070

[1] The figures for eligible area in these ESAs contain arable land which is eligible to enter the scheme if reverted to grass. It is not expected that a high proportion of such land will enter the scheme.

[2] The figures for uptake in these ESAs cover only the first six weeks of the initial application period.

Portable Telephones

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food pursuant to her answer of 12 May, Official Report, column 201, what was the expenditure on (a) service rental and (b) call charges for portable telephones.

Mr. Jack: The expenditure, excluding VAT, incurred on 1,200 portable telephones for 1993-94 by the Ministry and its associated executive agencies, was as follows:

(a) on Service Rental	228,348
(b) on Call Charges	110,507

Beef Special Premium Scheme

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she is taking within the Council of Ministers to resolve beef special premium scheme distortions for 1993.

Mr. Jack: In March 1994 we were able to secure the European Commission's agreement to a technical adjustment to the scaling back of 1993 beef special premium claims necessary because the number of claims in 1993 exceeded our regional ceiling. In England and Wales, this adjustment added about £2·50 to the average payment per 1993 beef special premium claimed and about £1·25 to the average payment per extensification premium. Given the increase in total payments under the 1993 scheme compared with previous years, and the very good market prices for beef in 1993, there is no justification for any further adjustments to the scaling back for 1993.

Cattle and Pigs

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she is taking to resist changes to EC directive 64/432 on trade in cattle and pigs.

Mr. Soames: The Government support the principle of removing unnecessary barriers to trade and support the initiative taken by the Commission in drafting a proposal to consolidate and amend directive 64/432/EEC with a view to facilitating trade. During negotiations on the proposed amendments to the directive, the Government will aim to ensure that the individual provisions are carefully assessed, do not increase the risk of disease being spread between member states and are not unnecessarily onerous on industry.

Channel Tunnel (Livestock)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further measures are planned to monitor the movement of livestock through the channel tunnel; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The channel tunnel operator, Eurotunnel, has informed the Ministry that its policy remains one of not carrying live animals, including farm livestock and horses, through the tunnel. The state veterinary service will monitor the tunnel in the same way as other south coast ports.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE have been confirmed in the United Kingdom since November 1986.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since November 1986 and up to 13 May 1994, 128,879 cases of BSE have been confirmed in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total of confirmed cases of BSE in the United Kingdom in animals born after the ruminant feed ban.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: As at 10 May 1994, 9,928 cases of BSE have been confirmed in Great Britain in animals born after the ruminant feed ban which came into operation on 18 July 1988. Some 39 cases have been confirmed in Northern Ireland in animals born after the ruminant feed ban which came into operation on 11 January 1989.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many United Kingdom farms have had at least one confirmed case of BSE, since November 1986.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since November 1986 and up to 13 May 1994, 31,395 farms in the United Kingdom have had at least one confirmed case of BSE.

Farming

Dr. Strang: To ask the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment she has made of the adequacy of the current arrangements for funding direct support payments to new entrants to farming; what consideration she is giving to introduce greater flexibility; and if she has raised these matters with her European counterparts.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 May 1994]: Current arrangements for funding direct support payments to new entrants to farming are, in the main, adequate given the complexity of the schemes concerned and the need to maintain the integrity of the integrated administration and control systems as an anti-fraud measure. However, I recognise that there are anomalies in the case of livestock farmers acquiring land after the IACS deadline because they cannot benefit from the IACS related livestock subsidies in that year. Officials are currently discussing with the European Commission whether it might be possible to allow transfer to take place in some clearly defined circumstances, provided proper controls were in place to prevent fraud.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what measures are presently in place to ensure that new entrants coming to farming after the deadline for the submission of IACS forms are not deprived of payments for the period up to the deadline in the following year; and what is the reason for these measures;

(2) what scope there is to provide new entrants coming to farming after 15 May with direct headage payments in respect of the period before the IACS year beginning May 1995.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 May 1994]: An IACS form is not required from farmers wishing to claim under the Sheep Annual Premium Scheme, or up to 15 livestock units under the beef special premium and suckler cow premium schemes provided they do not wish to receive the extensification premium. We are considering what arrangements should be made for hill livestock compensatory allowances in 1995 and will shortly be consulting the industry on proposals. The Council regulation establishing the arable area payments scheme specifically requires applications for payment to be submitted by 15 May and it is not possible for a new entrant to claim such payments retrospectively.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what circumstances it is a condition for direct support payments that a new entrant takes up occupancy of the farm on which the claim is to be based before the deadline for submission of IACS forms.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 May 1994]: In order to be eligible for arable area payments, beef special premium, suckler cow premium or hill livestock compensatory allowances, each farmer must submit annually an IACS form, including all of the land farmed, by the deadline. EC rules provide limited exemptions from this requirement for livestock farmers who wish to claim no more than 15 livestock units under the beef special premium or suckler cow premium schemes and do not wish to claim the extensification premium.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provision exists for new entrants to give forewarning of the intention to assume occupancy of a farm after the annual closing date for submission of IACS forms in order to secure annual payments adjusted to reflect the period when the farmer is in actual occupation.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 May 1994]: There are no specific provisions dealing with these circumstances.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what flexibility EC laws allow with regard to setting the date for submission of IACS forms to give entitlement to new entrants coming to farming after the last date for submitting claims.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 25 May 1994]: The EC rules require IACS forms to be submitted by 31 March. The Commission may allow a member state to set a later date, up to 15 May, if it is satisfied that this still allows proper checks to be carried out. In the United Kingdom, we have applied the latest possible date of 15 May. In circumstances where the IACS form relates only to permanent pasture, a member state may decide that it can be submitted at the same time as the first livestock application, but not later than 1 July.

EDUCATION

Local Management of Schools

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the schools, by local education authority, that had not had their budgets delegated under local management of schools schemes by (a) 1 January and (b) 1 April; and if he will express the number of such schools as a percentage of all schools.

Mr. Forth: The precise information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. We estimate that something over 1,000 county and voluntary schools did not have delegated budgets on 1 January 1994. All primary and secondary schools have had delegated budgets from 1 April 1994 except in a few cases where delegation has been withdrawn or deferred by the LEA. All special schools are due to have delegated budgets by 1 April 1996 although many will have them at an earlier date.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education with whom the responsibility lies for deciding whether to (a) hire a teacher, (b) carry out a repair and (c) replace items of furniture in schools with delegated budgets under the local management of schools.

Mr. Forth: Within the resources available to it, the governing body of a school with a delegated budget is responsible for determining the school's staff complement and selecting teachers for appointment. The local education authority, except in the case of aided schools, whose staff are normally employed by the governors, must appoint the persons selected unless they fail to fulfil any of the statutory requirements relating to qualifications, health and physical capacity or conduct. The respective responsibilties of governing bodies and LEA for building repairs and maintenance will depend on the terms of the LEA's LMS scheme, although governors will normally be responsible at least for internal decoration and other work of a non-structural kind. In the particular case of voluntary-aided and special agreement schools, repairs to the exterior of the buildings are the statutory responsibility of governors, who may apply for grant aid from the Secretary of State. Furniture for an LEA's schools will in general be provided by the LEA through its capital programme, but governing bodies are free to make purchases with funds from their delegated budgets if they so wish.

Nursery Education

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many children under the age of five years were attending on (a) a full-time basis and (b) a part-time basis (i) nursery classes, (ii) nursery schools or (iii) reception classes in primary school on the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of full-time and part-time pupils under five in maintained nursery and primary schools in England in January 1993 is shown in the table.

Pupils under five being attending maintained nursery and primary school in England—January 1993

	Full-time	Part-time
Nursery Schools	9,461	43,527
Primary Schools
Nursery Classes	27,307	259,619
Infant Classes	289,481	26,798

Primary Schools

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the local education authority's central costs percentage for a primary grant-maintained school in Solihull in 1993-94; what is the equivalent figure for 1994-95; and in how many local education authorities the proportionate change from 1993-94 to 1994-95 has been (a) greater and (b) smaller than in Solihull.

Mr. Robin Squire: The central percentage addition applying in 1993-94 for a primary grant-maintained school formerly maintained by Solihull local education authority was 15·6 per cent. The comparable figure applying to a grant-maintained primary school in Solihull in 1994-95 is 7·0 per cent. The proportionate change between 1993-94 and 1994-95 was greater than that applying in Solihull in two local education authorities, and smaller in 105 local education authorities.

The Funding Agency for Schools is recalculating the relevant percentages for 1994-95 on the basis of LEAs' expenditure plans for the current financial year. As a result of their consideration, the percentages applying in some local education authorities this year may increase.

School Statistics

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to his answer of 19 May, Official Report, column 547, if he will give (a) the provisional full-time equivalent teacher numbers for (i) nursery and primary schools and (ii) secondary schools as at January 1994 and (b) the provisional pupil numbers in (i) nursery and primary schools and (ii) secondary schools as at January 1994 giving the figures both for local education authorities and grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is as follows:

An estimated breakdown between primary and secondary of the provisional full-time equivalent numbers of teachers employed in the maintained sector, including self-governing (GM) schools. England—January 1994

	Thousands
Nursery and primary	197·6
Secondary	193·3
TOTAL	390·9

Projected full-time equivalent numbers of pupils in maintained schools, including self-governing (GM) schools. England—January 1994

	Thousands
Nursery and primary	4,120·7
Secondary	2,932·3
TOTAL	7,053·0

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the number of schools holding opt-out ballots, the number of yes votes and the total percentage of parents voting yes and total percentage voting no in (a) October 1993, (b) November 1993, (c) December 1993, (d) February 1994, (e) March 1994 and (f) April 1994.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the following table:

Parental ballots on grant maintained status

	Number of schools balloting	Number of Yes ballots	Total percentage of parents voting Yes	Total percentage of parents voting No
October 1993	16	13	67	33
November 1993	36	22	59	41
December 1993	40	28	56	44
January 1994	18	16	68	32
February 1994	30	16	48	52
March 1994	39	23	52	48
April 1994	26	12	49	51

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to offer financial assistance to those people or organisations who wish to promote new grant-maintained schools under section 49 of the Education Act 1993.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has no plans to offer financial assistance to promoters of new grant-maintained schools proposed under section 49 of the Education Act 1993.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many people requested further information, in response to his Department's advertising campaign for grant-maintained status during January and February, by (a) phoning the number given on the coupon in the advertisements and (b) returning the coupon.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department's GM publications centre received 3,913 requests for information between Janaury and the end of April. Of these, 996 calls to the freephone number are known to be attributable to the advertisements, as are the 1,177 coupons returned.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what were the criteria set by his Department for placing advertisements in national newspapers to promote the availability of information on grant-maintained status; and what was the estimated readership of the advertisements.

Mr. Robin Squire: The advertising campaign was designed to alert schools, governors and parents to the availability of factual information on grant-maintained status. It was timed to coincide with the introduction of the new statutory requirement that the governing bodies of schools should consider each year whether to ballot parents on applying for grant-maintained status. The newspapers where advertisements were placed were chosen because they enjoy a high level of readership among those likely to have an active interest in education.

It is not possible to estimate the readership of the advertisements themselves. However, the official Audit Bureau of Circulation estimated daily readership figures for the titles used during the campaign as follows:

	Number
Guardian	1,457,000
Independent	1,148,000
Mail on Sunday	5,999,000
Observer	1,619,000
Radio Times	5,433,000
Sunday Times	3,538,000
Times Educational Supplement	530,000

Parliamentary Counsel

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Education on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Forth: Parliamentary Counsel drafts not on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. On one occasion, in respect of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, Department for Education Ministers agreed that instructions should go to Parliamentary Counsel for an amendment to a private Member's Bill, with the intention that this should be tabled by the Government. That amendment was subsequently passed to a private Member.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Copyright Tribunal

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many references or applications have been heard by the Copyright Tribunal under its present rules of procedure.

Mr. McLoughlin: Eight references or applications have been heard by the tribunal under its present rules of procedure introduced in 1989 and amended in 1991 to take account of extension of the jurisdiction of the tribunal by the Broadcasting Act 1990. These cases have been of differing complexity and, in consequence, the length of hearings has varied from one day to several weeks, in two cases involving multiple applications and relating respectively to the use of TV listings information by newspapers and magazines and to the broadcasting of sound recordings by independent radio stations. Five further cases were resolved before reaching a hearing, although the tribunal made orders with the consent of the parties in two of these, and five cases are pending.

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many questionnaires were sent out, and how many completed questionnaires were received by the Patent Office in respect of the consultation into the functioning of the Copyright Tribunal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Some 98 questionnaires seeking views on the functioning of the tribunal were sent out to those who have been involved in tribunal proceedings, including both users of copyright works and copyright owners, and other interested parties, and 30 replies were received. My Department is in the process of analysing these responses, and I will consider in the light of this analysis whether any changes in tribunal procedures are desirable.

British Aerospace (Sales)

Ms Corston: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has made concerning the sale by British Aerospace of its space systems business to Matra Marconi Space; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Officials from the British National Space Centre regularly discuss current issues with companies in the space sector, including Matra Marconi Space and British Aerospace (Space Systems). Many of these discussions are of a commercially confidential nature.

Motor Vehicle Sales

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to review consumer protection legislation relating to the sale of used motor vehicles.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department has issued a consultation document on possible amendments to the law relating to transfer of title on the sale of goods, including the provisions in the Hire Purchase Act 1964 concerned with the sale of motor vehicles subject to a hire purchase or conditional sale agreement.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he proposes to take to strengthen consumer protection legislation regarding warranty offers on used motor vehicles.

Mr. McLoughlin: None. It is for the seller to decide what warranty, if any, he offers on the goods he sells.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met representatives of the motor vehicle industry to discuss motor vehicle warranty deals and the protection of consumer rights in motor vehicle sales.

Mr. Heseltine: Representatives of the industry have not had formal discussions with me on this subject. My last official meeting with the Retail Motor Industry Federation was in January 1993. A number of subsequent meetings with other Ministers and senior officials have taken place, on a range of issues, as part of the Government's continuing dialogue with leading representatives of the motor vehicle sector.

Competition

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his departmental officials last met representatives of the European Commissioner responsible for competition to discuss the application by Pallion Engineering Ltd., Sunderland, to accept an in-house ship repair contract from its majority shareholder.

Mr. Sainsbury: My officials last met representatives of the European Commission about Pallion on 9 February 1994.

Insolvency Acts

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to seek to amend the Insolvency Act 1986 so as to make it possible for creditors who do not have substantial funds to raise court action through the liquidator in cases of alleged fraudulent trading or wrongful trading.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have no plans to do so. It is a matter for those who stand to benefit in individual cases to provide the funds to take such actions.

Mr. Deva: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take following the enactment of the Insolvency Act 1994, regarding the position of receivers or managers who are not administrative receivers and their liability under contracts of employment they may adopt.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Government wish to learn the views of interested parties on whether it would be appropriate to extend the restrictions that the Insolvency Act 1994 introduced in relation to liability under contracts of employment adopted by administrators and administrative receivers and receivers in Scotland, to other receivers or managers.

During the passage of the Bill I indicated that extending its provisions to other receivers or managers would go beyond the Bill's narrow purpose and that such a step would need careful consideration. Interested parties are therefore invited to submit their views on this issue to The Insolvency Service (Policy Unit) at PO Box 203, 21 Bloomsbury street, London WC1B 3QW, by 15 August 1994.

Toxic Waste and CFCs

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the implications of the latest general agreement on tariffs and trade agreement for restrictions in the trade in (a) toxic waste or (b) chlorofluorocarbons.

Mr. Needham: The GATT Uruguay round agreement has no implications for restrictions on trade in toxic waste or CFCs.

Coal Research Establishment

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each year since 1986 the amount of investment made by the Government into the Coal Research Establishment.

Mr. McLoughlin: The annual investment by the Government into the Coal Research Establishment is as follows:

Government funding of CRE related activities—£ million (1994 prices)

Year	£ million
1986-87	1·7
1987-88	0·6
1988-89	0·2
1989-90	3·4
1990-91	11·7
1991-92	4·9
1992-93	1·7
1993-94	5·2

Note:

The monies shown represent Government contributions to:
The Grimthorpe research and development project.
The Point of Ayr coal liquefaction research and development project.
Contracted research and development in the fields of generic science and advanced power generation.
Projects paid for by the know-how fund.
Other ad hoc income from Government.

Investment for subsequent years up to 1997 totals £7·6 million for contracts already in place between CRE and DTI.

Cigarettes

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what research his Department is currently taking in respect of the production and manufacturing of cigarettes that are less of a fire hazard; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the current documents and research material his Department holds on the production and manufacture of cigarettes that are less of a fire hazard; what has been the result of his talks with the tobacco trade on producing safer cigarettes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department is in liaison with other Government Departments with an interest in the production of fire-safe cigarettes in order to assemble a body of research material. A list of documents has been placed in the Library of the House.

I have not held talks with the tobacco industry on this matter. I am currently monitoring events relating to proposed legislation concerning fire-safe cigarettes which is under discussion in the United States.

Energy-saving Initiatives

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his current policy in respect of gas consumers paying a levy to fund energy-saving initiatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The Government regard recent changes in the price control formulae of gas and electricity as welcome steps in promoting energy efficiency.

Chapter 8 of the joint DTI/Ofgas consultation document "Competition and Choice in the Gas Market" sets out proposals and options for further steps to promote the efficient use of gas in the new competitive gas market.

Defence Industry Exports

Mr. Worthington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of exports from defence industries are currently sent to developing countries; what is their value; and how the position has changed in cash and percentage terms in the past five years.

Mr. Needham: The information is provided in the table.

United Kingdom Exports of Defence Equipment to Developing Countries[1]

	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
Value (£ million)	957	1,938	1,584	1,440	1,156
Per cent. of total exports	70	80	80	77	77

Sandwell Borough Council

Dame Angela Rumbold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received about pre-stamping plastic capacity measures by Sandwell borough council; what steps he is taking to correct this anomaly; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have received representations from two plastic capacity measure manufacturers about the stamping of measures before they have been tested, a practice which appears to be acceptable to Sandwell metropolitan borough council.

I have it in mind to make use of the powers proposed by clauses 1-4 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill, once enacted, to amend the Weights and Measures Act 1985, so as to make pre-stamping lawful in defined circumstances and subject to prescribed conditions.

Nuclear Co-operation Agreement

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has regarding the current negotiations between the European Commission and the United States Government in regard to the extension and revision of the United States—Euratom nuclear co-operation agreement.

Mr. Needham: Negotiations are continuing on a new nuclear co-operation agreement to replace the existing agreement between the European Atomic Energy Community and the United States. The European Commission is responsible for the conduct of the negotiations. I am advised that the next negotiating meeting is scheduled to take place in June.

Manufacturing Statistics

Mr. Worthington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the percentage change in (a) manufacturing output and (b) manufacturing productivity in Britain and each of the European Union countries, Japan and the United States since 1979.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information available is given in the table:

Growth in manufacturing output and manufacturing productivity (output per head) between 1979 and 1993

	Percentage change Output	Productivity
Belgium	17	n/a
Denmark	n/a	n/a
France	1	30
West Germany	14	15

Consultants

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) of 16 May, Official Report, columns 302-4, if he will distinguish in the case of the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, the National Physical Laboratory, the National Engineering Laboratory and the National Weights and Measures Laboratory between consultancy used for management advice, consultancy used for marketing advice, and consultancy used for technical advice.

Mr. Heseltine: I have asked the chief executive of the agencies concerned to reply to this question, as it falls into the category of day-to-day operational matters.

Letter from R. D. Worswick to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 26 May 1994:

I have been asked to answer with respect to the Laboratory of the Government Chemist your question to the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his Answer to the honourable Member for Darlington of 16 May, Official Report, columns 302-4, requesting that he distinguish between consultancy used for management, marketing and technical advice.

Over the last five years (up to and including 1993-94) the Laboratory of the Government Chemist has let two consultancy contracts for management advice at a cost of £32,000; two for marketing advice at a cost of £44,000 and 9 for technical advice at a cost of £366,000.

Letter from W. Edgar to Mr. Jim Cousins dated 26 May 1994:

I would refer to your question to the President of the Board of Trade, requesting that he distinguish in the case of the DTI Research Establishments between consultancy used for management advice, marketing advice and technical advice.

The split of consultancy costs over the past five years for the National Engineering Laboratory is:

Marketing	222,582
Management	119,541,
Technical	18,324
TOTAL	360,447

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 26 May 1994:

I have been asked to reply in respect of this Agency, to your recent question to the President of the Board of Trade concerning the nature of consultancy contracts let in the last five years.

All of the consultancy contracts let by the National Weights and Measures Laboratory between April 1989 and March 1994 were for management advice.

Letter from P. B. Clapham to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 26 May 1994:

I am writing in respect of the National Physical Laboratory in response to your question to the President of the Board of Trade asking for a breakdown of consultancy contracts let by the DTI Laboratories.

Of the 82 consultancies referred to in my letter of 16 May 1994 to Mr. Alan Milburn MP, 7 were for consultancy used for marketing advice, at a total cost of £151,267 excluding VAT. The other 75, at a total cost of £1,321,058 excluding VAT, related to management advice in the widest sense. (This goes considerably wider than "management consultancy" as generally understood and includes, for example, software development in connection with new financial management information systems.)

"Technical consultancy" is not included in these figures, but is subsumed within the wide range of extra-mural research, technical and other assistance which NPL commissions in connection with its scientific programmes.

Pyramid Selling

Ms Harman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the adequacy of Government measures on pyramid selling.

Mr. McLoughlin: The legislation controlling pyramid selling and similar trading schemes has been criticised on a number of grounds. We intend to consult soon on specific proposals to amend both the primary legislation and the current regulations.

World Trade Organisation

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what will be the procedure by which the GATT council adopts reports produced by the dispute settlement panel.

Mr. Needham: The process by which panel reports are adopted will change under the World Trade Organisation, when responsibility for adoption will move from the council to the dispute settlement body. To allow members of the World Trade Organisation dispute settlement body time in which to consider panel reports, reports will not be considered by the body until 20 days after issue to members. Reports will be adopted by a meeting of the body within 60 days of issue, unless one of the parties to the dispute notifies its intention to appeal or unless all members of the body agree not to adopt.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what will be the criteria for selecting members of the panel of experts who will comprise the dispute settlement body of the World Trade Organisation.

Mr. Needham: The dispute settlement body will consist of representatives of the members of the World Trade Organisation.

Panelists shall be well-qualified individuals who have served on or presented a case to a panel; served as a representative of a World Trade Organisation member or of a contracting party to GATT or as a representative to a council or committee of any covered agreement or its predecessor agreement, or in the World Trade Organisation secretariat; taught or published on international trade law or policy; or served as a senior trade policy official of a member. They shall be selected with a view to ensuring that the panel has independence, a sufficiently diverse background and a wide spectrum of experience. Citizens of members of the World Trade Organisation whose Governments are parties to the dispute or third parties shall not serve on a panel connected with that dispute, unless the parties to the dispute agree otherwise.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the selection criteria for members of the appeal board of the dispute settlement body.

Mr. Needham: The understanding on dispute settlement stipulates that members of the appellate body of the dispute settlement body shall be persons of recognised authority, with demonstrated expertise in law, international trade and the subject matter of the covered agreements. They shall be unaffiliated with any Government, although the body's membership shall be broadly representative of the WTO's membership. They shall be available at all times and at short notice, and shall stay abreast of dispute settlement and other relevant WTO activities. They shall not participate in consideration of disputes that would create a direct or indirect conflict of interest.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what special assistance will be available from the GATT secretariat for developing countries in mounting or defending dispute settlement cases.

Mr. Needham: Under the present GATT, the secretariat may make available a qualified legal expert from its technical co-operation services at the request of any developing country involved in a dispute settlement panel. This will continue under the World Trade Organisation.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the relationship between a collective view adopted by the GATT council on a trade issue and (a) domestic or (b) EU legislation pertinent to that trade issue.

Mr. Needham: There is no direct relationship between the collective view of the GATT council and the legislation of the United Kingdom or the European Union. With the exception of notification requirements, GATT rules do not lay down what governments must do. Although it is possible for the GATT council to take decisions to change GATT rules, contracting parties which do not accept such changes cannot be obliged to accept them.

Where GATT dispute settlement panels find that a measure of an individual contracting party breaches GATT obligations, that contracting party may bring its measure into conformity with GATT rules; offer compensatory market access; or accept retaliatory withdrawal of market access. This position will be unchanged under the agreement establishing the World Trade Organisation.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how signatories of the GATT agreement will be able to bring about changes in (a) the membership of the dispute settlement body or (b) the panel of experts of the dispute settlement body of the World Trade Organisation.

Mr. Needham: The dispute settlement body shall be convened by the general council of the World Trade Organisation and will have the same membership as the general council, that is, representatives of all members of the World Trade Organisation. It will be for individual members to determine who their representatives shall be.

Members of the World Trade Organisation may periodically suggest names of individuals for inclusion on the World Trade Organisation secretariat's list of potential panelists, and their names shall be added to the list upon approval by the dispute settlement body.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the time limits under which the dispute settlement process under the World Trade Organisation will operate.

Mr. Needham: The understanding on dispute settlement envisages a number of stages in the dispute settlement process, most of which are time-limited and some of which are optional. However, after the initial period of consultations, unless otherwise agreed by the parties to the dispute, the period from establishment of a panel by the dispute settlement body until the body considers the panel or appellate report for adoption shall not exceed nine months where the report is not appealed or 12 months where the report is appealed.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the British contributions to the GATT for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Needham: The United Kingdom's contributions to the GATT have been, in Swiss francs:

	Swiss francs
1994	5,748,978
1993	5,575,393
1992	5,454,835
1991	4,939,530
1990	4,761,920
1989	4,057,044
1988	3,587,324
1987	3,599,990
1986	3,842,740
1985	4,333,550
1984	3,944,460

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will outline the appeals procedure by which a contracting party to the GATT agreement may appeal against a collective view adopted by the GATT Council arising from a dispute settlement panel report.

Mr. Needham: There is no appeals procedure under the existing GATT. Under the World Trade Organisation, within 60 days of issuance of a dispute settlement panel report, the dispute settlement body shall adopt the report unless it agrees by consensus not to do so, or if a party has notified its intention to appeal. Appeals shall be limited to issues of law covered in the panel's report and legal interpretation developed by the panel. Three members of the appellate body shall hear each case. In general, the appellate body should issue its decision no more than 60 days after a party to a dispute notifies its intention to appeal. In no case shall proceedings exceed 90 days.

The appellate body's report shall be adopted by the dispute settlement body and unconditionally accepted by the parties to the dispute within 30 days of the issuance of the report to dispute settlement body members, unless the body decides by consensus not to do so.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Campbell-Savours: to ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date (a) he or (b) his officials were first made aware of interest being expressed by citizens of Russia or other east European states in the purchase of operations of the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine: My officials and I are unaware of any such interest.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date a summary of the Stoy Hayward report on the Insolvency Service was made available to (a) the trade unions, (b) Insolvency Service staff, (c) the DTI Library and (d) the Library of both Houses.

Mr. Heseltine: A summary of the Stoy Hayward report on the Insolvency Service was made available to the Library of both Houses on 7 February 1994, to Insolvency Service staff and the trade unions on 8 February and to the DTI Library on 9 February.

Official Receivers

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what dates representatives of his Department met representatives of Stoy Hayward to discuss matters relating to official receivers.

Mr. Heseltine: In the course of both the first study carried out by them and the current feasibility study, Stoy Hayward will have been in almost daily contact with representatives of my Department, principally with officials in the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 23 May, Official Report, columns 74-75, on what dates representatives of his Department met representatives of Ian Greer Associates and discussed the subject of private sector involvement in the work of the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine: No such meetings have taken place.

Mr. Soley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the remit given by his Department to the Stoy Hayward options consultancy currently being undertaken into the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 25 May 1994]: The first study undertaken by Stoy Hayward considered the ways in which official receivers could concentrate more on their investigatory role by involving the private sector more in the mechanical processing work in insolvencies. A summary of Stoy Hayward's report was placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The remit for the feasibility study now in progress was to carry out a more detailed analysis of the costs, benefits and value for money of options identified in the earlier work.

Mr. Soley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has decided to privatise the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 25 May 1994]: No. We are examining ways in which the private sector can play a larger part than it already does in delivering the services of the Insolvency Service.

Ecocon Ventures

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 23 May, Official Report, column 74, on what dates representatives of his Department met representatives of Ecocon Ventures.

Mr. Heseltine: No such meetings have taken place.

Post Office

Mr. Spearing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state his reasons for refusing each of the requests made by the Post Office for permission to pursue commercial initiatives listed in its supplementary memoranda to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which were published on pages 31-2 of its first report on the future of the Post Office, HC 207, 1993-94.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 25 May 1994]: The Post Office's requests, some of which date back many years, were to expand its activities, often into areas already served by the private sector. As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade explained in his evidence to the Select Committee reproduced in the same report as that cited by the hon. Member, the Government need to consider the effect that greater commercial freedom for a publicly owned business would have on other firms. A number of businesses made clear to the Select Committee their concerns about the fairness of competition, as the Committee recognised at paragraph 20 of its unanimous report.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade where and by what means he has given his reasons for not choosing the option of maintaining the Royal Mail in public ownership but with enhanced commercial freedom.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 25 May 1994]: The Government have reached no decisions on the Post Office review. The hon. Member's question does not therefore arise. A Green Paper will be published shortly setting out the issues in full and outlining the options for change.

Coalfield Communities

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that British Coal land which is leased to miners' welfares for sports and recreational facilities in coalfield communities is preserved for the future of those communities.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 25 May 1994]: As part of the wider process of deciding on the disposal of the corporation's assets, I have asked British Coal to identify land which it owns and which is currently used for coal industry social welfare purposes, including recreation.

I will take into account local needs when taking decisions on the disposal of the land so identified, on who should receive the benefit of the use of that land and on the safeguards which might be required.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Stephen Lawrence

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General if he will refer to the Crown Prosecution Service the reports of activities of a police officer, details of which have been sent to him.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the involvement of a police officer, whose name has been supplied to him, in the Stephen Lawrence murder case.

The Attorney-General: It is for the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis to consider whether the activities of any individual require investigation. Where allegations and complaints are made about the activities of a police officer the chief officer of the relevant force will have regard to the procedures established under part IX of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Attorney-General if he intends to review the decision of the CPS not to proceed with a prosecution in the case of the murder of Stephen Lawrence.

The Attorney-General: The proceedings arising from the death of Stephen Lawrence were discontinued because the Crown Prosecution Service concluded, after a careful and detailed examination of the evidence, that there was no realistic prospect of conviction. Reconsideration of that decision would not be justified unless significant fresh evidence were to become available.

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Attorney-General what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

The Attorney-General: Two civil servants in the Crown Prosecution Service.

Treasury Solicitor Act 1876

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Attorney-General how often the powers of the Treasury Solicitor Act 1876 have been used to create offshore bank accounts or conduct share transactions in the United Kingdom and overseas in the name of Government Departments and agencies; and in what form the use of these powers is reported to Parliament.

The Attorney-General: Currently there are no offshore accounts which have been created under the powers in the Treasury Solicitor Act 1876. Information about such accounts which may previousy have been created since 1876 is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The Treasury Solicitor has conducted share transactions as nominee of Government Departments or their agencies but principally on behalf of the Treasury for purposes connected with privatisations. Information identifying the number of such share transactions could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Any reporting to Parliament of share transactions by the Treasury Solicitor as nominee for another Government Department will be the responsibility of that other Department.

Rolan Adams and Stephen Lawrence

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the matters referred to him by the hon. Member for Woolwich in respect of the Rolan Adams and Stephen Lawrence murder cases.

The Attorney-General: No. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible in response to his letter of 23 May.

International Military Services Ltd.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Attorney-General whether it was the practice of the Treasury Solicitors to attend the annual general meetings of International Military Services Ltd. as shareholders.

The Attorney-General: No.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Attorney-General on which occasions the Treasury solicitors offered advice to International Military Services Ltd.

The Attorney-General: I am not aware of any such occasion.

DeLorean

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Attorney-General whether Treasury solicitors have offered advice in the Government's actions over the DeLorean company.

The Attorney-General: The Treasury Solicitor's department has, since 1985, advised on the proceedings which have been brought by the Department of Economic Development in Northern Ireland in connection with the accounts of the DeLorean company. Currently, the Treasury Solicitor's department is liaising with the lawyers responsible for the litigation in the United States of America and is advising Government Departments in connection therewith.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Attorney-General when he plans to publish his departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and what has been the cause of the delay in publishing the departmental guidance.

The Attorney-General: In respect of the departments for which I have responsibility, the code of practice directly applies only to the Treasury Solicitor's department. I have announced the intention of the Crown Prosecution Service and the Serious Fraud Office to seek voluntarily to comply with the code so far as possible, 22 March, Official Report, column 218. Internal guidance is being drawn up within the Treasury Solicitor's department, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Serious Fraud Office. This will be made available once it has been finalised, in accordance with the provisions in the code of practice. In the meantime, each division of the Treasury Solicitor's department, all Crown Prosecution Service offices and the Serious Fraud Office have copies of the Cabinet Office guidance on interpretation of the code, which has already been placed in the House of Commons Library.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judicial Appointments

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans his Department has to abolish the requirement that solicitors eligible for elevation to the High Court bench should hold additional advocacy qualifications.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The statutory requirements for appointment as a High Court judge are to have a 10-year High Court qualification within the meaning of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990—that is, a right of audience in relation to all proceedings in the High Court; or to be a circuit judge who has held that office for at least two years. The Lord Chancellor has no plans to change these requirements.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans his Department has to improve the procedures by which appointments are made to the judiciary; and what plans he has to publish a report on such improvements.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-west (Mr. Richards) on 19 May, Official Report, column 529. The Lord Chancellor's proposals are set out in a consultation paper, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many Queen's counsel refused the offer of appointment to (a) the High Court bench and (b) the circuit bench in (i) 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) in each of the last five years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Information relating to 1970 and 1980 is not available.

The numbers of Queen's counsel who have declined an offer to recommend their names to Her Majesty The Queen for immediate appointment to the High Court Bench and, on the basis of the information readily available, to the circuit bench in each of the last five years are as follows.

	High Court bench	Circuit bench
1989-90	—	—
1990-91	—	1
1991-92	1	—
1992-93	6	—
1993-94	2	1

Private Members' Bills

Ms Lynne: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested Parliamentary Counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Parliamentary Counsel does not draft on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers. Since April 1992 neither the Lord Chancellor nor I have authorised officials to instruct Parliamentary Counsel to prepare amendments to private Members' Bills which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Sex Offences

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what (a) compulsory and *(b)*optional training for judges in the area of cases involving sex offences has been provided by the Judicial Studies Board since July 1993.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Once every five years, all judges attend Crown court refresher seminars run by the Judicial Studies Board. Some of the sessions in the seminars are devoted to the study of sex offences. In addition, judges who hear family cases attend a special residential seminar once a year. Since July 1993 there have been four Crown court refresher seminars and one special family seminar.

Appeal Judges

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the names and the dates of appointment of all currently serving lords justices of appeal.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The names of the lords justices, and the dates they were appointed to the Court of Appeal are as follows:

Name
Sir Brian Dillon	30 September 1982
Sir Brian Neill	11 January 1985
Sir Martin Nourse	3 June 1985
Sir Iain Glidewell	3 June 1985
Sir John Balcombe	11 June 1985
Sir Patrick Russell	12 January 1987
Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss	11 January 1988
Sir Murray Stuart-Smith	13 January 1988
Sir Christopher Staughton	13 January 1988
Sir Michael Mann	13 January 1988
Sir Donald Farquharson	12 June 1989
Sir Anthony McCowan	3 October 1989
Sir Roy Beldam	3 October 1989
Sir Andrew Leggatt	30 January 1990
Sir Richard Scott	1 October 1991
Sir Johan Steyn	10 January 1992
Sir Paul Kennedy	25 June 1992
Sir David Hirst	1 October 1992
Sir Simon Brown	1 October 1992
Sir Anthony Evans	1 October 1992
Sir Christopher Rose	1 October 1992
Sir Leonard Hoffman	1 October 1992
Sir John Waite	11 January 1993
Sir John Roch	11 January 1993
Sir Peter Gibson	23 March 1993
Sir John Hobhouse	1 October 1993
Sir Denis Henry	1 October 1993
Sir Mark Saville	11 January 1994
Sir Peter Millett	12 April 1994

Upper Limb Disorders

Dr. Marek: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the present number of civil servants taking legal action against his Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of civil servants at present taking legal action against my Department as a result of work-related upper limb disorders is 24.

Courts and Legal Services

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to publish the first results of the fundamental review of expenditure on the courts and legal services.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The fundamental review team will make its first report to the Lord Chancellor at the end of June 1994. It will not be published. Any change in policy resulting from the review will be announced in the usual way.

Lawyers (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research his Department has done into the effectiveness of the Bar Council's decision in October 1991 to set a quota of two representatives of the ethnic minorities in each set of chambers; what percentage of chambers in (a) London and (b) the provinces have so far achieved this target; and what plans he has to assist the Bar Council in increasing these percentages.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor's Department has not undertaken any research into the effectiveness of the Bar Council's race equality policy, adopted in October 1991, which anticipated that at least 5 per cent. of all chambers' membership would be barristers from ethnic minorities. This is a matter for the Bar Council.

Legal Aid Board

Mr. Alton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated cost so far to the Legal Aid Board of franchising, including the full cost of recruiting and training quality auditors; and what are the expected costs for the financial year 1994-95.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The cost of franchising to the Legal Aid Board in the years prior to 1993-94 is not available. At that time, the cost was relatively small and consisted largely of the time of senior officials at the board developing the policy behind franchising. In 1993-94 the board began to recruit and train staff for the implementation of franchising. The cost of franchising to the board in 1993-94 was £3·4 million. For 1994-95 expenditure of £3·9 million has been budgeted.

Family Panels

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research he has commissioned in to the possibility of domestic violence cases being heard by family panels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: No such research has been commissioned. Some domestic violence cases are currently heard by family proceedings courts. The Lord Chancellor has given detailed consideration to the Law Commission's report on civil remedies for domestic violence and the most appropriate venue for such cases to be heard has formed an important part of that consideration.

ENVIRONMENT

Local and Regional Government

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department collects on the functions of government which are undertaken in whole or in part by local or regional authorities in other countries in the European Union.

Mr. Gummer: The information that the hon. Member requires is produced by the Steering Committee of Local and Regional Authorities of the Council of Europe and relates to "Structure and Operation of Local and Regional Democracy" in member states.

Private Members' Bills

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what occasions since April 1992 Ministers from his Department have (a) requested parliamentary counsel to assist in preparing amendments to private Members' Bills on behalf of other private Members and (b) authorised officials to instruct parliamentary counsel to prepare amendments which were subsequently passed to private Members.

Mr. Gummer: Parliamentary counsel drafts not on behalf of private Members but on the instructions of Departments acting on the authority of Ministers.

With the authority of Ministers, amendments were drafted by counsel on instructions from my Department and subsequently passed to private Members in respect of the following private Members' Bills:

the Local Government (Overseas Assistance) Bill;
the Noise and Statutory Nuisance Bill;
the Hedgerows Bill;
the Energy Conservation Bill.

Amendments to the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill on matters of concern to my Department were drafted by parliamentary counsel on instructions from the Department of Social Security with the assistance of officials from my Department and subsequently passed to a private Member.

Ministers have authorised officials to instruct parliamentary counsel to prepare amendments to the following Bills which were subsequently passed to Peers:

the Local Government (Overseas Assistance) Bill;
the New Towns (Amendment) Bill;
the National Parks Bill.

Minewater Contamination

Mr. Hoon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to prevent contamination by minewater of the Erewash and Leen rivers and of groundwater in Nottinghamshire following the closure of Annesley Bentinck colliery; and if he will make it his policy that the present regime will be continued for as long as necessary to prevent such contamination.

Mr. Atkins: It is for British Coal, in consultation with the National Rivers Authority, to assess any environmental effects of colliery closures and to consider what action may need to be taken to avoid water pollution. In the case of the Annesley Bentinck colliery, I understand that the two parties are currently participating in a joint study to assess the environmental consequencies of ceasing minewater pumping.

Consultants

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each of the last five years the cost to public funds of consultancy work provided by (a) KPMG Peat Marwick, (b) Touche Ross, (c) Price Waterhouse, (d) Ernst and Young, (e) CSL, (f) Prime, (g) Basis, (h) Theodore Goddard, (i) Dibb Lupton Broomhead, (j) Capita and (k) Shreeveport to his Department; and if he will list any other firms which have provided consultancy work and the costs to public funds for each of the last five years.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is not held centrally by my Department and is obtainable only at disproportionate cost.

Water Pollution, Worcester

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects (a) to receive and (b) to publish the report of the drinking water inspectorate into the pollution of water supplies in Worcester on 15 April.

Mr. Atkins: The drinking water inspectorate's investigation will be completed as soon as possible. Publication of its report may be delayed if a prosecution of Severn Trent Water Ltd. is pursued.

Mobile Homes

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the protection for tenants in the Mobile Homes Act 1983 against unreasonable landlords; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Mobile Homes Act 1983 gives certain rights and protection to all residents whose agreements with their site owner allows them to live in their mobile home as their main residence. These include security of tenure and the right to sell their mobile home on site. Many site owners also give additional rights to residents in excess of the statutory requirements. An industry-backed code of good practice, the residents charter launched in January this year, aims to encourage high standards on mobile home sites.

The rules governing reasonable behaviour apply to mobile home site owners just as they apply to all citizens. In addition, local authorities have the power to start legal proceedings against site owners who are harassing their residents.

Housing Renovation Grant

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate his Department has made of the job creation effect of housing renovation grants.

Sir George Young: The diverse nature of the work assisted through house renovation grants makes it difficult to give precise estimates of the job creation effects. However data in research work undertaken for the Department suggest that up to 17,000 man years work in the construction industry could potentially be attributable to house renovation grant expenditure in 1993-94.

Consultation Papers (Responses)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 12 April, Official Report, column 132-33, on which matters of widespread interest his Department received more than 9,500 responses; and whether those matters were presented in the form of a Green Paper.

Mr. Baldry: The consultation exercise that started in November 1992 relating to the authorisations for radioactive waste discharges at Sellafield drew approximately 80,000 responses; a second round of consultation based on the justification for nuclear fuel processing at the site, launched in August 1993, drew some 42,000 individual letters plus petitions containing about 25,000 signatures. Neither of these matters was presented in a Green Paper. The consultation exercise, launched with the November 1993 publication, "London: Making the Best Better", which was not a Green Paper, drew almost 11,000 responses.

Sewers

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 19 May, Official Report, column 532, what regulations his Department has placed on the sewerage undertakers to provide protection for public health against sewer blockages or collapses.

Mr. Atkins: Each sewerage undertaker has a statutory duty under section 94 of the Water Industry Act 1991 to maintain sewers so that the area for which it is responsible is effectively drained and to make provision for emptying sewers and effectually disposing of the contents. It is for each sewerage undertaker to decide how to comply with the legislation. The duty is enforceable by the Director General of Water Services.

Environmental Action Fund

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his criteria for deciding whether to give or refuse grants under the environmental action fund.

Mr. Atkins: The environmental action fund exists to assist voluntary organisations with work in England which advances the Government's environmental policies as set out in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance". Successful applicants must satisfy financial criteria, undertake work that supports the Department's policy objectives or carry out projects within defined priority areas, and promise value for money. Particular emphasis in 1994-95 was given to supporting organisations with innovative approach and those new to environmental work. Grants are awarded to those who score highest against these criteria. Funds are not available for projects which could get grant under any other programme.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to publish his departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and what has been the cause of the delay in publishing the departmental guidance.

Mr. Baldry: My Department relies on the central guidance on interpretation, which has been placed in the Library of the House. In addition, guidance is being prepared on the charging arrangements operating in my Department, which should be available by the end of June. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Redcar of 19 May, Official Report, column 533-34, how many representations he has received for, and how many against, the need for shadow elections to be held before the unitary authorities coming into existence; and if he will place copies of such representations in the Library.

Mr. Curry: My officials wrote to the four districts and the county council in Cleveland on 25 February, informing them that, because of the judicial review case brought by the county council, it would be impossible for us to lay an order providing, inter alia, for elections to be held in May this year. We therefore sought the views of the majority and minority groups on the relevant local authorities on three options:

(a) elections later in 1994, with a start-up date for the unitary authorities in 1995;

(b) start-up in April 1995, with elections in May 1995;

(c) elections in May 1995, with the unitary authorities not being established until April 1996.

Option (a) was preferred by the Labour and Liberal Democrat groups on Middlesbrough borough council and the Liberal Democrat groups on Langbaurgh-on-Tees and Stockton-on-Tees borough councils. Option (b) was the first choice for all three groups on Hartlepool borough council, for the Labour and Conservative groups on both Langbaurgh-on-Tees and Stockton-on-Tees borough councils and for the Conservative group on Middlesbrough borough council. Option (c) was the preference for all three groups on Cleveland county council. The county council was supported in this view by the Association of County Councils.

Representations were received in favour of option (a) from the National Association of Local Councils and in favour of a shadow period of about 11 months between the elections to, and implementation of, the new unitary authorities from Unison.

I have placed copies of all these representations in the Library.

Waterways Ombudsman

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many complaints have been received by the waterways ombudsman from the date of appointment by the British Waterways Board in August 1993.

Mr. Atkins: Since the date on which the waterways ombudsman was appointed, six complaints have been received.

Colliery Spoil

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those individuals and organisations who responded to minerals planning guidance note 3, on coal mining and colliery spoil disposal; and if he will place copies of those responses in the Library.

Mr. Baldry: I am arranging for copies of the responses to be placed in the Library of the House together with a list of those who responded to the consultation exercise.

National Parks

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each local authority and for England as a whole (a) the total area, (b) the area occupied by national parks and (c) the percentage of area occupied by national parks.

Mr. Atkins: The figures are as follows. Those local authorities which are not listed do not have land designated as a national park within their boundaries.

	Total area (ha)	Area occupied by national park (ha)	Percentage of area designated as national park

Carbon Dioxide

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which Governments have adopted the target of a 20 per cent. cut in carbon dioxide on 1988 levels by 2005; and what plans he has to adopt this target.

Mr. Atkins: As far as I am aware, only the Governments of Denmark, Germany and Luxembourg have formally and unconditionally adopted such a target. The United Kingdom is committed, though its ratification of the United Nations framework convention on climate change, to take measures aimed at returning emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by 2000. The Government have no plans at present to adopt a different target.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities and council tax payers outside the reorganised areas will be protected from the increased costs of local government reorganisation.

Mr. Curry: In most cases reorganisation should, over time, lead to reduced costs. There would need to be significant non-financial benefits to justify a reorganisation that did not lead to net savings. We would expect savings and, exceptionally, any net costs, to be confined to the areas being reorganised.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how it is proposed that the transitional costs of local government reform in England will be met in 1995-96 and in subsequent years.

Mr. Curry: Authorities subject to reorganisation in 1995 will be able to borrow to meet transitional costs incurred this year. Similar arrangements will apply for 1995-96 and later years, but taking account of authorities' ability to meet the costs from savings and receipts generated by reorganisation. We shall be consulting local government on the arrangements later in the summer.

Oslo and Paris Commissions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what proposals concerning nuclear issues have been tabled for the 16th joint meeting of the Oslo and Paris Commissions, 13 to 17 June; and if he will place in the Library a summary of them;

(2) what will be the United Kingdom's policy in respect of the proposals concerning nuclear issues at the forthcoming 16th joint meeting of the Oslo and Paris Commissions; and what are the reasons for this policy;

(3) how the recently announced Department of Environment review of radioactive waste management policy alters the position that the United Kingdom will take at the 16th joint meeting of the Oslo and Paris Commissions;

(4) what representations his Department is prepared to accept from international organisations or Governments such as the member states of the Oslo and Paris Commissions, in relation to the Department of Environment review of radioactive waste management policy;

(5) what representations his Department has had from Parcom member states regarding the forthcoming 16th joint meeting of the Oslo and Paris Commissions.

Mr. Atkins: Draft recommendations on nuclear issues have been presented jointly by Denmark, Iceland, Ireland and Norway concerning:

—the management of spent nuclear fuel;

—environmental impact resulting from discharges of radioactive substances; and

—increases in radioactive discharges from nuclear reprocessing plants;

The Netherlands has submitted proposals concerning a revised reporting format proposal and Greenpeace has submitted papers on United Kingdom discharge policies and a non-reprocessing option. Copies of the proposals have been placed in the Library.

It is not for one member of the commissions to disclose what has been said to it by other members in the course of negotiations.

The United Kingdom considers that the role of the Oslo and Paris Commissions in radioactivity matters is to protect the marine environment with a general objective of ensuring that best available techniques are applied to inputs of radioactive substances within the appropriate regulatory system. The commissions do not have a role in the decision process for individual plants or management options.

The preliminary conclusions of the review of radioactive waste management policy, announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 19 May, will not be available until later in the summer. The Department of the Environment will, of course, give full consideration to all representations made in relation to the review.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the voting record of the United Kingdom on nuclear issues at the meeting of the Oslo and Paris Commissions.

Mr. Atkins: Since 1987 there have been seven Paris Commission recommendations on radioactive issues. The United Kingdom has accepted all of these except for the most recent, recommendation 93/5, concerning increases in radioactive discharges from nuclear reprocessing plants where, together with other contracting parties, the United Kingdom reserved its position.

Somerset Levels and Moors

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the number of staff employed in the management of the Somerset levels and moors national nature reserve for each year from 1987 to the present;

(2) if he will list the area covered by management agreements in the Somerset levels and moors for each year since 1987 for agreements between the Nature Conservancy Council/English Nature and owners or occupiers of sites of special scientific interest;

(3) what has been the total sum of money paid out and the average payment per hectare on management agreements in the Somerset levels and moors for each year since 1987 for agreements between the Nature Conservancy Council/English Nature and owners or occupiers of sites of special scientific interest;

(4) what was the area in each moor, in the Somerset levels and moors national nature reserve in high water level management consistent with maintaining and enhancing its wetland nature for each year since 1987;

(5) how many management agreement exist in regard to the Somerset levels and moors between English Nature and owners or occupiers of sites of special scientific interest and the number which are due to be reviewed in 1994-95;

(6) how many staff have been employed in the negotiation and administration of management agreements on sites of special scientific interest in the Somerset levels and moors for each year since 1987 by the Nature Conservancy Council/English Nature;

(7) what is the expenditure proposed by English Nature on the management of (a) the Somerset levels and moors candidate special protection area and (b) the Somerset levels and moors national nature reserve for the years (i) 1994-95, (ii) 1995-96 and (iii) 1996-97.

Mr. Atkins: From 1987-1990, one, and from 1990 to date, two staff have been employed in the management of the Somerset levels and moors national nature reserve. From 1987 to 1993, four permanent staff, and from 1993 to the present, three permanent staff, were involved in the negotiation and administration of management agreements in the Somerset levels and moors.

There are 191 management agreements relating to the Somerset levels and moors, of which 12 are due for review in 1994-95. Information about payments under these agreements and the area covered is not available in the form requested. In 1993-94 the total sum paid out in annual payments under management agreements in the Somerset levels and moors was £335,681, and the average payment was £151 per hectare per annum. As at 31 March 1994, 2,218.52 hectares were covered by management agreements.

Estimated expenditure within the Somerset levels potential special protection area is expected to be at a similar level for 1994-95 and subsequent years. Net expenditure on the national nature reserve is negligible as the land is owned by English Nature and attracts receipts in excess of £15,000 per annum.

Since 1987, the only area within the Somerset levels included in the experimental high water level area is Southlake, which covers some 130 hectares.

Climate Change

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his policy on changes in greenhouse gas emissions from human-made sources within the United Kingdom after the year 2000;

(2) which measures he will take to prevent an increase in carbon dioxide emissions from the United Kingdom from the year 2000 onwards;

(3) what targets he has adopted or will adopt with respect to carbon dioxide emissions from the United Kingdom after the year 2000 onwards.

Mr. Atkins: The Government's position on action under the climate change convention was set out in chapter 10 of the United Kingdom's climate change programme, published in January. This commits the United Kingdom to making a full and appropriate contribution beyond 2000 to achievement of the convention's ultimate objective, and makes it clear that our national programme to achieve the current commitments in the convention will be reviewed and developed in the context of the international response.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has submitted a report or communication to the secretariat of the intergovernmental negotiating committee for a framework convention on climate change on the views of the United Kingdom Government for the review of the adequacy of commitments in article 4 of the convention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The United Kingdom has not at this stage submitted any papers on this subject to the secretariat.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he plans to attend the 11th session of the intergovernmental negotiating committee for a framework convention on climate change, to be held in New York in February 1995.

Mr. Atkins: No decision has yet been made on United Kingdom representation at the 11th session of the intergovernmental negotiating committee.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on the negotiation of protocols under the United Nations framework convention on climate change.

Mr. Atkins: We are willing to consider any constructive proposal for protocols to the convention.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he plans to attend the 10th session of the intergovernmental negotiating committee for a framework convention on climate change, to be held in Geneva from 22 August to 2 September; and what matters will be discussed there.

Mr. Atkins: Officials from my Department and others will represent the United Kingdom at the 10th session of the intergovernmental negotiating committee. The agenda for the meeting has not yet been issued.

Out-of-town Shopping Centres

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the planning applications (a) granted or (b) pending to build out-of-town shopping centres.

Mr. Curry: Planning applications are made to the local planning authority in the first instance and there is no central record of applications received or granted. We are monitoring major applications, and those which could have a cumulative impact. This helps inform the Secretary of State should he consider calling them for his own decision. That power is used sparingly.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many warehouse clubs are currently under construction in England; and how many have planning permission but have not yet started construction;

(2) how many (a) out-of-town shopping centres and (b) out-of-town warehouse parks are under construction in England.

(3) how many (a) out-of-town shopping centres and (b) out-of-town warehouse parks currently have planning permission but have not yet started construction in England.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not available.

Water Quality

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal costs were incurred by the United Kingdom Government in defence of the actions taken by the European Commission over the bathing water directive, July 1993 and the drinking water directive, November 1992.

Mr. Atkins: The disbursements incurred on behalf of the United Kingdom in connection with the proceedings taken by the European Commission in the European Court of Justice concerning the bathing water directive, case C56/90, and the drinking water directive, case C337/89, were about £35,000. This figure includes counsel's fees, VAT, travelling and hotel accommodation, but does not otherwise include the costs of staff in the Treasury Solicitor's Department or of lawyers in the Department of the Environment who provided legal services and advised within the normal course of their duties.

Local Referendums

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 24 May, Official Report, column 96, if he will list the powers available to local authorities which would allow them to hold referendums on particular issues.

Mr. Baldry: Local authorities do not have any specific powers to hold referendums but may be able to rely on the Local Government Act 1972, section 111—subsidiary powers of local authorities—in conjunction with one or more of their functions; section 141 of that Act—research and the collection of information; and the Local Government Act 1985, section 88—research and collection of information.

Tenants' Cash Incentive Scheme

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been made available to the London boroughs of (a) Southwark, (b) Lewisham, (c) Lambeth and (d) Tower Hamlets to operate the tenants' cash incentive scheme in the last 10 years; how many council properties have been vacated as a result of the scheme in these areas during this period; and if he will make a statement on the long-term future of the scheme.

Sir George Young: The tables show the resources allocated to the cash incentive scheme in each of these London boroughs, along with the resources actually spent and the number of vacancies created, since the scheme was introduced in 1989.

The cash incentive scheme is a cost-effective housing measure which enables local auathorities to improve the supply of affordable housing for rent to people in need, and at the same time assists households to buy a home of their own. We will continue to encourage local authorities to operate a scheme.

Urban Waste Water

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce the designation of sensitive areas in accordance with annexe II A(b) and (c) of the urban waste water treatment directive (91/271/EEC).

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 18 May to my hon. Friend the Member of Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) Official Report, column 513.

Public Consultation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what circumstances it is his Department's practice, when issuing a public consultation document, to inform those consulted that their responses will be made public unless they explicitly ask for them to be kept confidential; and if he will arrange for his Department to do so in all cases in future.

Mr. Baldry: It is normal practice in the Department of the Environment, except in relation to some detailed technical consultations, technical exercises by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the London consultation exercise where respondents were informed that their names and addreses would be treated in confidence, to inform those consulted that all responses may be made publicly available unless respondents have requested that their comments should be treated as confidential.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what public opinion surveys his Department or consultants to his Department have conducted into the attitude of people in (a) West Cumbria or (b) the United Kingdom towards the policy option to return to Japan high-level waste arising from reprocessing at Sellafield.

Mr. Atkins: None.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether British Nuclear Fuels plc is in breach of planning conditions regarding the importation of spent fuel to the THORP receipt and storage facility; what action he is planning to take to enforce the planning condition; and if he will require BNFL to cease importation immediately in the interim.

Mr. Baldry: I am not aware that BNFL is in breach of any conditions attached to the planning permission for the THORP receipt and storage facility at Sellafield. If it is, responsibility for taking appropriate enforcement action rests with Copeland borough council in the first place. I have no plans to require BNFL to cease importation of spent fuel.

Shared Ownership Schemes

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many properties bought under shared ownership schemes have been repossessed.

Sir George Young: Information on the number of repossessions of properties bought under shared ownership schemes is not collected by my Department and is not held centrally.

Right to Buy

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many properties bought under the right to buy scheme have been found to have some form of structural defect which was undetected at the time of purchase.

Sir George Young: Following comprehensive studies by the Building Research Establishment, 24 dwelling types in England have been designated as inherently structurally defective under part XVI of the Housing Act 1985. Where owners purchased such properties from public sector landlords before the defects became known, they were given rights to assistance under the 1985 Act. Local authorities estimated that there were almost 31,000 properties whose owners qualified for assistance under the scheme. Statistics are not held centrally on how many of those properties were bought under the right to buy scheme.

Civil Servants (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many job offers were reported by staff in his Department under the requirements of the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments in each of the last 10 years by (a) staff of grade 3 and above, (b) staff below grade 3, (c) staff in sections concerned with procurement or contract work, under section 15 of the rules of 1 February 1993 and (d) staff in other sections, under section 14; and how many of these reports were followed by an application to join the company concerned.

Mr. Baldry: Information about offers of outside employment to staff in this Department is not recorded.

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which bathing beaches fail environmental standards because of seagulls.

Mr. Atkins: No bathing waters are considered to fail the bacteriological standards of the bathing water directive consistently because of seagulls. However, as the tests under the directive do not distinguish between human and other sources of faecal pollution it is possible that contamination by mammals and birds will contribute to occasional failures.

Parish Polls

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 23 May, Official Report, column 86, if he will make it his policy to collect information on parish polls.

Mr. Baldry: We have no plans at present to adopt such a policy.

Water Supplies

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the occasions in the last five years when a water authority or company has supplied water which has been found to be unhealthy, stating the water authority or company involved in each case.

Mr. Atkins: In 1992 water companies in England and Wales carried out approximately 3·75 million tests of the various parameters by which compliance with the standards for drinking water are assessed. Of these tests, 98·7 per cent. demonstrated compliance with the relevant water quality standard. There is no evidence that any of the contraventions was of such a magnitude or duration as to endanger the health of consumers.

Since the drinking water inspectorate was established on 2 January 1990, it has been informed by water companies of 295 incidents which affected, or threatened to affect, drinking water quality. To date no water companies have been prosecuted for supplying water unfit for human consumption.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on the latest available figures, if he will set out (a) by company, the money received for the sale of the Property Services Agency and (b) the cost of redundancy and early retirement following the sale of the agency.

Mr. Curry *[holding answer Wednesday 25 May 1994]:*On (a), I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to him on 19 January and 3 February 1994 on the proceeds from the sale, which have not changed. Updated information on (b), is set out in the table below, in the same format as the 3 February 1994 reply for completeness.

	BM Scotland	BM Manchester	BM SouthEast	BM South and West	BM Noreast

Travellers

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of official gipsy sites in each local authority area in England for which statistics are collected.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer Thursday 26 May 1994]: My Department publishes annually in January a list of gipsy sites in England based on information provided by local authorities. The most recent list, January 1994, has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take against those local authorities whose direct labour organisations failed to meet their statutory financial objectives for 1992-93.

Mr. Baldry: In March this year, 27 statutory notices were served on 12 local authorities concerning the failure of their direct labour organisations to meet the required financial objective in 1992-93. Further notices were served in May and others will be served over the next few months.

My right hon. Friend has now considered the responses of those authorities on which notices were served on 21 March. He has today given directions to East Cambridgeshire—other catering; East Yorkshire—building maintenance, highways and sewerage; the London borough of Haringey—highways and sewerage; Hastings—highways and sewerage, ground maintenance, other catering; Maidstone—building maintenance and sport and leisure management; and North Hertfordshire—ground maintenance.

These directions take three different forms:

Preventing authorities from carrying out the defined activities after September 1995 if they fail to meet the required financial objectives for the work during the current year, 1994-95. East Yorkshire, Maidstone (building maintenance) and North Hertfordshire were given directions of this sort.

Requiring authorities to seek the Secretary of State's consent if they wish to award work on the defined activity to their DLO following retendering which is currently underway. East Cambridgeshire, Hastings and Maidstone (sport and leisure management) fall into this category.

Preventing the authority from carrying out elements of the defined activity through its own DLO. Haringey's direction fell into this category.

The Secretary of State has also decided to take no further statutory action in respect of financial failure in 1992-93 by:

Huntingdonshire (ground maintenance), Lancashire (ground maintenance), North Hertfordshire (sport and leisure management, vehicle maintenance), Sheffield (building cleaning, school and welfare catering) and Staffordshire Moorlands (ground maintenance) because they met their financial objectives in 1993-94;

Mid Bedfordshire (sport and leisure management) because the work in question is to be contracted out.

He is still considering responses from Burnley borough council—building maintenance, ground maintenance, new construction work, other catering, other cleaning, refuse collection; and from Sheffield City Council—refuse collection, other cleaning, and other catering.

I am pleased to say that the majority of DLOs operate successfully, and provide a cost-effective service to local taxpayers. Local authorities have now had over five years' experience of CCT—over 10 years in the case of building and construction work. There is no reason why all DLOs should not be able to operate to the prescribed financial standard. The number of notices being served this year reflects the fact that we are now taking statutory action against all DLOs recording any significant financial failures. I am also pleased to note that, in many cases where financial losses have been incurred, local authorities have taken prompt action to put matters right.

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to make regulations to extend compulsory competitive tendering to all local authority highway work by abolishing the present competition-free allowance.

Mr. Baldry: Regulations made under sections 7, 9 and 23 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 amending the Local Government (Direct Labour Organisations) (Competition) Regulations 1989 were laid before the House on 10 June. These come into force in England on 1 April 1995. The Government have consulted representatives of local authorities on these proposals, and the start date of 1 April 1995, seven months later than first proposed, reflects authorities' comments and allows additional time for authorities to carry out tendering.

The regulations abolish the present 40 per cent. competition-free allowance for small general highways jobs undertaken by local authority direct labour organisations and remove the exemption from competition of winter maintenance work. Recent Audit Commission research showed that the progressive extension of competition for highways work had produced cost savings while maintaining standards of service. These amendments are in accord with the Government's aim to increase the areas of local authority work subject to competition to promote greater efficiency, to give greater value for money to local taxpayers, and to improve the quality of services.

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Government's proposals for the extension of compulsory competitive tendering to further local authority services.

Mr. Baldry: Compulsory competitive tendering is being extended to six professional support services, in a phased programme—legal services, professional construction and property services, IT, finance, personnel, and corporate and administrative services. Detailed proposals for each service are being developed in close and very productive consultation with the local authority associations, the Audit Commission, the Accounts Commission for Scotland and the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. The Government also propose to extend CCT to three further manual services—management of on-street parking, security work and vehicle management.

Detailed consultation proposals for legal CCT and for the manual services were issued by my Department on 15 December 1993 and 16 November 1993 respectively. The Government have now considered the responses received from local authorities, the Law Society and other interested parties, and I have today tabled an order under section 2 (3) of the Local Government Act 1988 which will provide, subject to resolution of both Houses of Parliament, for these services to become "defined activities" for the purpose of CCT.

I hope that the debates on the order will take place shortly. Subject to Parliament's approval of the order, the Government will then make regulations under section 6 (3) of the 1988 Act, to establish the competition requirement and start dates.

As regards legal services, the Government have concluded that the proportion of authorities' legal activity to be subject to CCT should be 45 per cent., as suggested in the consultation proposals. I have carefully considered the suggestion that the competition figure should be lower, but I feel confident that the proposed figure—subject also to a minimum in-house provision of £300,000 to safeguard the position of small authorities—will enable authorities to gain the benefits of competition across a wide range of their legal work, while ensuring that authorities can maintain the necessary in-house legal expertise. The minimum figure of £300,000 will be reviewed periodically to ensure that it continues to meet its purpose.

The Government propose that authorities will be able to count the following categories of legal work towards meeting their CCT requirement: work carried out in-house following a voluntary competitive exercise; work carried out for locally managed schools; legal work related to housing management, where this service will become subject to CCT at a later date for the authority in question; legal work in support of other local authority activity which itself has been exposed to CCT and legal work already contracted out.

In response to comments received, the draft order provides that, where individual members of staff spend less than 50 per cent. of their time on legal work, their time will not be included in the authority's aggregate of defined legal activity. We propose that the same cut-off figure will apply to the other professional support services also. This will reduce the administrative effort of operating CCT.

We also propose that legal services will become subject to CCT from April 1996 in the London boroughs and English metropolitan districts. This will, I believe, allow authorities good time to prepare specifications and carry out tendering. For the English shire authorities, CCT will come into effect following local government review and the determination of each authority's new structure. Separate timetables will apply in Scotland and Wales.

CCT requires authorities to operate free and fair competition. My Department will this week be issuing guidance to local authorities and others on the conduct of tendering for white collar services. This guidance reflects valuable comments received on the consultation draft, and it emphasises that quality of service should be fully considered alongside price, in selecting the best tender proposal.

The Government have also considered responses to the consultation proposals issued on 22 February 1994 for the internal accounting framework to accompany the introduction of professional CCT. As indicated in the consultation proposals, authorities will be required to establish and publish a "Statement of Support Service Costs" as part of their annual accounts. Regulations under section 23 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 to this effect will be made shortly. The new statements will identify the costs of each of the six support services to an authority, providing local taxpayers and authorities' members and managers with valuable new information. In order that SSSCs can cover all six support services from the outset, SSSCs will start in 1995-96 for the London boroughs and metropolitan districts. For the shire authorities, SSSCs will come into effect following local government review. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy is writing guidance material to assist authorities prepare SSSCs, which it expects to complete and publish in the autumn.

As the Minister for Transport in London and I told the House on 30 March—Official Report, columns 755 and 867, the three further manual services will become subject to CCT from October 1995 in the London boroughs and metropolitan districts, and following local government review in the case of the English shire authorities. The definitions of the further manual services have been clarified, following comments on the consultation proposals. We are discussing further with the local authority association provisions for exempting security work undertaken under byelaws which grant local authority officers powers of enforcement. I will make a further announcement in due course.

Some 266 responses were received on the consultation proposals for legal CCT, 114 on those for the internal accounting framework, and 200 on those for the manual services. I have placed lists of responses in the Library.

Local Government Management

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes to make to the councillor's allowances system in the light of the recommendations of the joint working party on internal management of local government in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Government have accepted the recommendation of the working party on the internal management of local government that local authorities should have much greater discretion in deciding how much councillors should be paid in allowances. We agree with the working party that the present system is too prescriptive and that it places an unnecessary bureaucratic burden on local authorities. The changes that we propose to make will remove that burden and will encourage people with a wide range of backgrounds, experiences and skills to serve as councillors. Removing the ceiling on the allowance that leading councillors can be paid will allow local authorities to give more adequate remuneration to those councillors with special responsibilities. There will be no overall increase in public expenditure as a consequence of these changes.

I have today written to those who chair the local authority associations seeking their views on the proposals that we are making. Copies of my letter to the associations have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Severance Pay

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to announce new severance pay proposals for local government employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: We are today beginning consultations with local government and other interested parties on new severance pay regulations to complement the Local Government (Compensation for Premature Retirement) Regulations 1982. Local authority associations, local authorities and other local government interests are being invited to submit representations by 13 July. Copies of the consultation material are being placed in the Library. We intend, subject to any further representations, to make and lay the regulations before the House in the summer.

We are proposing to give councils new powers to allow one-off payments to categories of pensioners who had their pensions reduced as a consequence of the Court of Appeal's judgment in Allsop v. North Tyneside.

Our proposals also give councils the opportunity to provide improved levels of severance pay both for general cases of redundancy as a result of local government reorganisation. In developing our proposals we have considered carefully the advice of the Local Government Staff Commission (England) and views expressed by other interested parties.

I am satisfied that these proposals are both fair in comparison with other public service schemes and affordable to local government. They provide a good statutory framework to help compensate employees made redundant and the terms proposed compare favourably with those available to other public sector employees.

These proposals do not cover the staff commission's recommendations to compensate employees for reductions in pay—detriment—on which a further announcement will be made shortly.

Costs of all severance packages must be met from authorities' own resources and not from local authority pension funds. Future local government finance settlements will take account of the transitional costs of local government reorganisation, including those due to severance payments.

TREASURY

Aggregate, Race Bank

Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what royalties the National Rivers Authority will pay the Crown Estate Commissioners for aggregate dredged from Race bank.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No decision has been made under the Government view procedure that Race bank will be the source of material for the Mablethorpe to Skegness coast protection scheme. If Race bank material is used, the NRA will pay the Crown Estate a royalty based upon the current commercial royalty rate in the area taking into account the quantity, quality, grade and location of the material used.

Consultants

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of the last five years the cost to public funds of consultancy work provided by (a) KPMG Peat Marwick, (b) Touche Ross, (c) Price Waterhouse, (d) Ernst and Young, (e) CSL, (f) Prime, (g) Basis, (h) Theodore Goddard, (i) Dibb Lupton Broomhead, (j) Capita and (k) Shreeveport to his Department; and if he will list any other firms which have provided consultancy work and the costs to public funds for each of the last five years.

Mr. Nelson: The list gives the firms which have provided consultancy work to Her Majesty's Treasury since 1991-92. I regret that information going back beyond this date can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The list gives a total value for each year but is not specifically broken down by firm. As some firms have only had single contracts for each year, giving information in the way asked would breach our commercial in confidence rules. The list excludes contracts awarded to individuals, academics and academic institutions.

Income Tax

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue would be lost to the Exchequer by a 1p reduction in the basic rate of income tax; and how much would be generated by an increase in the basic rate of one penny in the pound.

Mr. Dorrell: The direct revenue effect of a 1p reduction or increase in the basic rate of income tax in a full year would be £1·8 billion at 1994-95 levels of income.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 397, when the 1993 figures for uncollected schedule D tax will be available.

Mr. Dorrell: The figure for uncollected schedule D tax for the account year 1993 will be included in the Board of Inland Revenue's annual report in the autumn.

Personal Investment Authority

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what date the Personal Investment Authority will start operating; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: Recognition of self-regulating organisations under the Financial Services Act 1986 is a responsibility of the Securities and Investments Board. I understand that, subject to recognition, the Personal Investment Authority expects to begin regulating its members in July 1994.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies and independent financial advisers have joined the Personal Investment Authority.

Mr. Nelson: I understand that, as of 24 May, the personal investment authority had received 2,787 applications and that 299 firms had been accepted for membership.

Public Service Pensions

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further changes there have been in the rules relating to abatement of public servants' pensions since 11 July 1991; and what proposals she has to provide a procedure for the consideration of abatement as regards those in receipt of early retirement pensions under the local government superannuation and teachers' superannuation scheme who are re-employed in (a) the same branch of the public service and (b) any other branch of the public service.

Mr. Portillo: There has been no change in the Government's policy relating to the abatement of public service pensions since the then Economic Secretary's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) of 21 December 1989, column 370 and the Minister for State's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) of 11 July 1991, column 425. Since then, the rules of the various public service pension schemes to which the policy applies will have been amended as necessary to give effect to it.

The policy remains that those in receipt of an early retirement pension from a public service scheme who are re-employed in the same public service may have their pensions abated. Those who are re-employed in a different public service can be subject to abatement of either their pay or pension if the criteria for appointment required earlier public service experience.

The detailed procedures for determining abatement are for the public services concerned.

Alternative Minimum Tax

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the answer given to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 2 May 1991, Official Report, columns 296-97, estimating the effect on Treasury revenues in 1994-95 of introducing an alternative minimum tax.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is as follows:

Additional tax liability arising from introduction of alternative minimum tax on gross income, 1994-95

Gross income of individual taxpayer (£)	Rate of minimum tax 20 per cent. £ million	25 per cent. £ million
Over 40,000	35	180
Over 45,000	30	100
Over 50,000	25	75

The estimates do not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of the new arrangements.

Personal Income

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the breakdown of personal income in the United Kingdom as between earned income, benefits and basic state pension, occupational pensions, and supplementary pension, interest, profits and dividends at 1970, 1980, 1985, 1989 and 1992.

Mr. Nelson: Information on households' income and expenditure is published annually at current prices in table 4.9 of the "Central Statistical Office Blue Book, United Kingdom National Accounts" and on the CSO database; both sources are available in the Library.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to publish his departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and what has been the cause of the delay in publishing the departmental guidance.

Mr. Nelson: The guidance has been available since 4 April. A copy has been sent to the hon. Member and copies have also been placed in the Library of the House.

Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report all the companies who have been fined, and the amounts imposed, for breaching the existing LAUTRO regulations.

Mr. Nelson: To date, LAUTRO has imposed the following fines:

(i) during 1994
Norwich Union	300,000
Premium Life	300,000
Manulife	65,000

Uncollected Tax

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 396, when the 1993 figures on uncollected corporation tax will be available.

Mr. Dorrell: The figure for uncollected corporation tax for the account year 1993 will be published in the Board of Inland Revenue's annual report in the autumn.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 398, when the 1993 figures for uncollected PAYE and national insurance contributions will be available.

Mr. Dorrell: The figures for uncollected PAYE and national insurance contributions for the account year 1993 will be included in the Board of Inland Revenue's annual report in the autumn.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 397, when the 1993 figures for uncollected capital gains tax will be available.

Mr. Dorrell: The figure for uncollected capital gains tax for the account year 1993 will be published in the Board of Inland Revenue's annual report in the autumn.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in real exchange rates measured in terms of relative unit prices since the second half of 1973; and to what extent this affected the demand for, and supply of, skilled labour.

Mr. Nelson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 21 March 1994, Official Report, column 15, which provides references to exchange rate and price data, which can be used to calculate the information requested.

The real exchange rate is only one factor affecting the demand for, and supply of, skilled labour. It is difficult to isolate the effect of changes in the real exchange rate from that of other factors, such as the impact of structural reform of the labour market.

Scientific Research

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he is giving to the provision of further guidance by the Inland Revenue as to the meaning and scope of scientific research as outlined in section 139 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: Scientific research is defined in the Capital Allowances Act as covering

> "any activities in the fields of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge".

Whether any particular activities fall within this definition will depend on the facts of the case. However, in general terms, activities are scientific research if they involve the application of new scientific principles in an existing area of research or the application of existing principles in a new area of research. The essential test is innovation.

Public Consultation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what circumstances it is his Department's practice, when issuing a public consultation document, to inform those consulted that their responses will be made public unless they explicitly ask for them to be kept confidential; and if he will arrange for his Department to do so in all cases in future.

Mr. Nelson: No consistent pattern has been followed in the past. It is now the Treasury's policy, when issuing a public consultation document, to ensure that those responding are aware that their responses may be made publicly available unless they have requested otherwise.

Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effects on employment, gross domestic product, total national insurance contributions and tax revenues of (i) the construction and (ii) the re-equipment activity arising from compliance with the requirements of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill over (a) 10, (b) 15, (c) 20 and (d) 25 years; and if he will explain the basis for his calculations.

Mr. Portillo: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Government Bonds

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is currently the largest purchaser of Government bonds.

Mr. Nelson: A sectoral breakdown of purchases of Government securities is given at table 10.2F of the Central Statistical Office's "Financial Statistics".

Public Sector Companies

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the combined output in 1993 as a percentage of gross domestic product of (a) the companies privatised in the last 15 years and (b) those still in the public sector.

Mr. Nelson: Information on the output of companies privatised in the last 15 years is not available on a national accounting basis.

The estimates of output of companies still in the public sector are not yet available for 1993. However, for 1992 the output of these companies was 3·5 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Excise Duties

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to prevent differences between excise duties in the United Kingdom and France affecting pubs and clubs in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: Customs are taking firm action against individuals attempting to evade duty and compete unfairly against legitimate trade by smuggling alcoholic drinks and tobacco. Those involved run the risks of losing the imported goods and the vehicle used to transport them, and of a prison sentence of up to seven years. In the 15 months to March 1994, customs made 1,588 detections involving £2·3 million in revenue.

Small Companies

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to consider further a scheme to enable small companies which have been established for about five years to expand their premises, their staff and their output through some tax-friendly assistance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Proposals for measures to help business will be carefully considered in the run-up to the next Budget. Last year's Budgets included several measures to encourage the growth of small companies. In particular, the enterprise investment scheme and venture capital trusts will stimulate funds for unquoted trading companies. Relief on capital gains where proceeds are reinvested in unquoted trading companies, and retirement relief, also give an incentive to invest in small companies.

Welsh Office Block Grants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what formula is used to calculate the Welsh Office block grant as a proportion of total expenditure.

Mr. Portillo: The Welsh Office block is determined under established formula arrangements, in accordance with which the block is adjusted by 6·02 per cent. of the changes made to plans for comparable English programmes.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much in percentage and cash terms of total public expenditure the Welsh Office block grants represented in each of the years between 1988-89 and 1994-95.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested is contained in the table:

£ million

	1988-89	1989-90	[1]1990-91	[1]1991-92	1992-93	1993-94	1994-95

[1] The increase from 1990-91 to 1991-92 is accounted for by an increase in the Community Care grant of £268 million. From 1992-93 onwards responsibility for Training in Wales was transferred from the Department of Employment.

Taxation

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the proportion of income taken in (a) direct tax, (b) indirect tax and (c) total tax for single pensioners aged over 75 years on (i) average pensioner income, (ii) half average pensioner income and (iii) twice average pensioner income;

(2) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the proportion of income taken in (a) direct tax, (b) indirect tax and (c) total tax for single pensioners aged 65 to 74 years on (i) average pensioner income, (ii) half average pensioner income and (iii) twice average pensioner income;

(3) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the proportion of income taken in (a) direct tax, (b) indirect tax and (c) total tax for pensioner couples aged 65 to 74 years on (i) average pensioner income, (ii) half average pensioner income and (iii) twice average pensioner income;

(4) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the proportion of income taken in (a) direct tax, (b) indirect tax and (c) total tax for pensioner couples aged over 75 years on (i) average pensioner income, (ii) half average pensioner income and (iii) twice average pensioner income.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 19 May 1994]: Figures for direct tax payments are in the table. Information on indirect tax payments is not available. For the hypothetical family types examined, real after-tax income rose, between 1978-79 and 1992-93, by over £30 per week for the single pensioner with an average income and by over £80 per week for a couple at 1992-93 prices.

Notes:

1. The estimates use figures for the average gross incomes of singles and couples where the head is over 65 obtained from the Family Expenditure Survey. These figures are for calendar years and are only available up to 1992. Separate figures for the average incomes of those aged 65-74 and over 75 are not readily available. All figures are subject to sampling error. They are also not strictly comparable over time because of changes in the Family Expenditure Survey.

2. The estimates assume that all income is taxable and that the pensioners have no tax allowances other than the personal and married couple's allowance.

3. Gross income is assumed to be split between the husband and wife in the ratio 70:30. None of the wife's income is assumed to be from earnings.

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the level of income at which pensioner couples aged over 75 years start to pay income tax (a) in cash prices, (b) in 1994-95 prices, (c) expressed as a proportion of average earnings and (d) expressed as a proportion of average pensioner income;

(2) if he will provide estimates for the years 1978-79 to 1995-96 of the level of income at which pensioner couples aged 65 to 74 years start to pay income tax (a) in cash prices, (b) in 1994-95 prices, (c) expressed as a proportion of average earnings and (d) expressed as a proportion of average pensioner income.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 19 May 1994]: Only 30 per cent. of pensioners currently pay income tax. Available information on tax thresholds is given in the table. The figures show that the tax thresholds for pensioners have risen significantly in real terms. For the single pensioner with an average income, real after-tax income rose by over £30 per week between 1978-79 and 1992-93 and for a married couple the increase was over £80 at 1992-93 prices.

[1] Married man's allowance for years prior to 1990–91. Personal allowance plus married couple's allowance for 1990–91 onwards.

[2] Assumes a growth in the retail prices index of 3·25 per cent. in 1994–95 in line with the forecast in the November 1993 Financial Statement and Budget Report.

[3] Average earnings are taken to be the average gross annual earnings of all full-time males on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. These are assumed to be equivalent to £347·70 a week in 1992–93, £359·90 in 1993–94 and £374·40 in 1994–95, based on illustrative earnings growth assumptions of 3¾ per cent. in 1993–94 and 4 per cent. in 1994–95.

[4] Average income of a pensioner couple is derived from Family Expenditure Survey data and relates to calendar years. It is not possible to separately identify wife's income and so all income is assumed to be taxed as the husband's income.

[5] Aged 80 or over for 1987–88 and 1988–89.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much disabled employees will have to pay at the maximum in additional income tax on the cost of the necessary alterations to a company car for their use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 26 May 1994]: The new system for taxing employees on the private use of company cars is based on 35 per cent. of the price of the car for tax purposes. The price of a car for tax purposes includes the price of accessories with the car. The amount of income tax any individual taxpayer has to pay on a company car depends on the list price of the car and the price of the accessories. "Accessories" includes optional extras such as an automatic gearbox or power steering, and special equipment for disabled people.

Income tax is not charged if a car is provided for travel to and from work because a person is severely and permanently disabled to the extent that he or she can get to work no other way; the car has been specially adapted to the employee's needs; and no other non-business use of the car is permitted or made.

If such a person uses the specially adapted car for other private travel the journeys to and from work are treated as if they were "business" travel. This means those journeys count towards the discounts from the car benefit charge.

In addition, disabled people may be entitled to the mobility component of the disability living allowance which gives extra financial help to those whose disability impairs mobility.

Private Schools

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much would be netted by putting value added tax on private school fees.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimate of the revenue which would be received by removing the exemption from value added tax for private schools.

Sir John Cope [holding answer 26 May 1994]: The Treasury publication "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs" shows an estimate for the total revenue forgone from the VAT exemption of education as being £600 million in 1993-94. This includes universities. No separate estimate has been made for private schools. Many types of establishment may fall under the general description of "private school". Some of these establishments provide education that is subject to the standard rate of VAT.

Vehicle Licences, Northern Ireland

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial provision was made in the current financial year for the payment of commissions to the Post Office for the issuing of vehicle licences in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tim Smith: I have been asked to reply.

Although no specific financial allocation was made in the current financial year for payment to Post Office Counters Ltd. for the issuing of vehicle licences in Northern Ireland, the agency responsible for vehicle licensing in Northern Ireland has been allocated £4·433 million for 1994-95 from which it has to deliver all its services.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what costing evaluation of the undiscounted lifetime costs for the proposed national repository for nuclear waste in Cumbria has been conducted by his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: I have been asked to reply.

Departmental officials have been participating in work to examine the cost implications of Nirex's proposed repository. The results of this examination will be considered in the radioactive waste management review being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the number of (a) men and (b) women living in the London borough of Wandsworth who were refused income support during 1993 because they were regarded as not being actively seeking work.

Mr. Burt: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security from what date the Benefits Agency adopted the policy of making special payments if a claim for benefit is delayed six months beyond the management target for dealing with such claims; and how much has been paid out from that date.

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend, the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) on 4 May 1993, at column 10. Details of payments made for the year ending 31 March 1994 have not yet been collated.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what restrictions are placed on unemployed adults studying for less than 21 hours per week while in receipt of income support.

Mr. Burt: People attending a part-time course of not more than 21 hours a week may, under certain circumstances, continue to receive income support but only if they are continuing to make a sustained effort each week to find a job and are prepared to leave the course immediately a suitable vacancy becomes available.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to publish his departmental guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and what has been the cause of the delay in publishing the departmental guidance.

Mr. Hague: There are no plans to supplement the code of practice or the central guidance on interpretation with additional Departmental guidance on implementation.

This Department's existing arrangements for the provision of information already work well and it is our intention that the code of practice will reinforce and build on them. References to the code will therefore be incorporated in any relevant procedural guidance.

Eurostat Poverty Survey

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the recent Eurostat survey in respect of poverty and social security payments in Europe.

Mr. Burt: The report is a compilation of general statistics on life in the European Community and does not address the issue of poverty in relation to social security payments. However, the report shows that the United Kingdom's expenditure on social protection as a percentage of gross domestic product was above the European Community average in 1992.

Public Consultation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances it is his Department's practice, when issuing a public consultation document, to inform those consulted that their responses will be made public unless they explicitly ask for them to be kept confidential, and if he will arrange for his Department to do so in all cases in future.

Mr. Hague: It is already normal practice in this Department for public consultation documents to include the advice that comments received may be made publicly available unless confidentiality is specifically requested.

The results of consultation exercises may be made available in summary form, or responses may be published in full, depending on the nature of the issue and the strength and diversity of opinion.

Civil Servants (Political Campaigns)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what limitations are placed on political campaigning by individuals employed by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: Political activities of civil servants in this Department are determined by chapter 4.4 of the personnel management section of the civil service management code, a copy of which is in the Library.

For the majority of staff below grade 7 level there are no limitations unless they are employed in certain areas of work. Staff at grade 7 level and above, administrative trainees and higher executive officers are barred from national political activities and must seek permission to take part in local political activities.

Where political activity involves campaigning about issues relating to this Department, staff must have regard to general rules on conduct set out in chapter 4.1 of the personnel management section of the civil service management code.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what limitations are placed on individuals employed by his Department regarding campaigning to change the workings of the Child Support Act 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: Civil servants are bound by the rules set out in chapter 4.1 and annex A of the personnel management section of the civil service management code, a copy of which is in the Library.

Campaigning by civil servants employed in this Department to change the workings of the Child Support Act 1991 through political or public activity would not be regarded as acceptable under the rules.

Chronic Bronchitis

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals have applied for benefit in respect of chronic bronchitis or emphysema; how many of those claims have been successful in the period since the inception of the scheme; how many of these claims were refused on the basis of (a) insufficient lung function loss, (b) insufficient lengths of service and (c) non-diagnosis of class 1 pneumoconiosis; and if he will give these figures according to standard British Coal regions.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. The table gives the information by Benefits Agency area directorate as at 22 May 1994:

Area	Claims received	Assessed at 14 per cent. or more disabled[1]	Disallowed on employment grounds[2]	Disallowed on medical grounds[3]

[1] Claims assessed at 14 per cent. or more result in an award of benefit.

[2] Claims are disallowed where the claimant has not worked underground in a coal mine for at least 20 years.

[3] Claims disallowed on medical grounds include those where there is insufficient lung function loss; those where category 1 pneumoconiosis has not been diagnosed, and those where chronic bronchitis or emphysema has not been diagnosed.

Figures are based on a 100 per cent. count and are subject to amendment. Not all the claims received would have been decided by 22 May.

Independent Living Fund

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many payments were made from the independent living (1993) fund in 1993-94; and what conclusions he has drawn as to the efficiency and effectiveness of the operation of the fund in that period.

Mr. Scott: I am informed by the director of the independent living (1993) fund that, as at 31 March 1994, there were 224 severely disabled clients receiving payments from the fund. In a further 164 cases, an offer of help had been made by the fund but had not yet been accepted by the client.

I am pleased with the progress that the fund has made in establishing partnership arrangement with local authorities and in devising effective joint care packages for individual clients. The trustees, director and staff have worked with dedication and with sensitivy to the needs of their clients during this period.

Civil Servants (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many job offers were reported by staff in his Department under the requirements of the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments in each of the last 10 years by (a) staff of grade 3 and above, (b) staff below grade 3, (c) staff in sections concerned with procurement or contract work, under section 15 of the rules of 1 February 1993 and (d) staff in other sections, under section 14; and how many of these reports were followed by an application to join the company concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES (HANSARD) ● 1993-94

CHADWYCK-HEALEY Vol. 244 cols. 365-556 23 May-17 June 1994

Mr. Hague: Prior to 1985 civil servants were not required to report any job offers from an outside employer. Since then, this Department has required staff below grade 3, whether in procurement or contract work or not, to report any such approaches to a senior manager at least two grades above. Staff grade 3 or above are required to report any such offers to either the head of department or the Minister. Records of these reports are not kept.

Records relate to staff who have made an application to take up an outside business appointment. They do not distinguish between types of outside appointment or specify whether the application was followed up or not.

Some 78 applications were received for the period 1984-94 as shown in the table.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to maintain in being his panel of experts, or a subgroup of it, in order to monitor the effectiveness and appropriateness of the new medical test of incapacity for work and to advise on such modifications as may prove necessary.

Mr. Scott: The assessment panel was formed to help us construct incapacity scales to be used in the new medical test. We are still considering the procedures for monitoring and evaluating both the new benefit and the medical test of incapacity.

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to apply the Social Security (Sickness and Invalidity Benefit and Severe Disablement Allowance) Miscellaneous Amendment Regulations 1994 so as not to give discretion to refuse benefits on the grounds that a person is capable of work if he or she has undertaken work as a volunteer for fewer than 16 hours in the week in which it was performed; and if he will alter the regulations to make this clear.

Mr. Scott: The purpose of the regulations is to allow people who have been accepted as incapable of work for the purposes of sickness benefit, invalidity benefit or severe disablement allowance to do unpaid voluntary work of fewer than 16 hours in a week without losing benefit. We believe that they achieve this. They are not intended to override the usual medical control procedures which apply to all claims. If an adjudication officer decides, for other reasons, that a person is not incapable of work, it is clearly right that benefit can be withdrawn, notwithstanding the fact that a person is doing voluntary work. It is not our intention that people should lose benefit solely because they do such voluntary work, and this has been made clear in the guidance issued by the Benefits Agency.

Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which amendments to the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill made in Standing Committee were taken into account in the compliance cost assessment; which amendments were not taken into account; and what were the reasons for the Government's approach in this regard.

Mr. Scott: Amendments which could be readily quantified were taken into account in preparing the compliance cost assessment. Others, for example on phase-in times, which were not specific enough to give a clear indication of timing or impact, made it impossible to identify costs over an unspecified period and therefore could not be taken into account.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received in support of his Department's handling of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We have received a wide range of representations about the handling and implications of the Civil Right's (Disabled Persons) Bill.

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what effects there are on his assessment of the costs of compliance with the requirements of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill if he takes into account clause 10 as amended in Committee and assumes compliance over a period of (a) 10, (b) 15, (c) 20 and (d) 25 years;

(2) what estimate he makes of the additional costs of adaptation and/or replacement of (i) aircraft, (ii) trains, (iii) buses, (iv) coaches and (v) other means of carriage used in providing transport services to the public, if compliance with the requirements of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill is deferred for (a) 10, (b) 15, (c) 20 and (d) 25 years.

Mr. Scott: The costs would depend not only on assumptions made about the rate at which compliance was achieved over the phasing period but also on the particular persons or bodies exempted from immediate compliance. Where it was possible to do so, the compliance cost assessment published on 5 May gave indications of the impact of longer phase-in periods. Further information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Private Investigation Services

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 5 May, Official Report, column 617, how much his Department has spent on private investigation services during the last two years; if he will list those companies which have been employed by his Department during this period; what safeguards his Department took to ensure that these agencies were members of the Association of British Investigators; and what guidelines are currently in operation within his Department as regards this matter.

Mr. Hague: This Department spent £116,522 in 1992-93 and £65,261 in the 1993-94 year on the service of legal documents in connection with the collection of arrears of national insurance contributions. The private and commercial investigations company used, which is not named for reasons of commercial confidentiality, is a member of the Association of British Investigators. No departmental guidelines are currently in operation with regard to this matter.

Disabled People

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what response the Government have made to the European Commission's Green Paper on social policy which requested views from member states by 31 March on the best method of achieving progress in the integration of disabled people.

Mr. Scott: A copy of the response to the European Commission by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is in the Library.

Welfare Benefits, Europe

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which of the British welfare benefits are classed as (a) social security and (b) social assistance benefits for European Economic Area purposes.

Mr. Burt: For EEA purposes, social security benefits are those which are designed to meet the specific contingencies listed in article 4(1) of regulation (EEC) No. 1408/71 on social security for migrant workers. The social security benefits for which this Department has responsibility are listed below. The definition also covers benefits in kind—that is, health care—provided by the national health service.

Child Benefit
Guardian's Allowance
Maternity Benefit
Sickness Benefit
Unemployment Benefit
Family Credit
Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit
Severe Disablement Allowance
One Parent Benefit
Invalidity Benefit
Retirement Pension
Statutory Sick Pay
Widow's Benefits

Social assistance is not defined in EC legislation but is generally interpreted as covering non-contributory schemes which are often means-tested and based on individual need rather than specific contingencies.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what proposals he has to make disability living allowance more accessible for those with learning difficulties.

(2) what proposals he has to make access to disability living allowance more equitable for those with a mental illness.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 19 May 1994, c. 539]: Owing to a clerical error a phrase was inadvertently omitted. The reply should have been as follows:

> "None. Entitlement to disability living allowance is intended to depend on the care and mobility needs arising from a particular condition, rather than on the condition itself. Access to DLA is available to all disabled people through the claiming process. The Benefits Agency provide support services to assist people in making a claim."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Public Consultation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Attorney-General in what circumstances it is his Department's practice, when issuing a public consultation document, to inform those consulted that their responses will be made public unless they explicitly ask for them to be kept confidential; and if he will arrange for his Department to do so in all cases in future.

The Attorney-General: Should a public consultation document be issued, usual practice would be followed whereby comments are sought on the understanding that they can be made publicly available unless respondents have requested that their responses be treated as confidential.

Civil Servants (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General how many job offers were reported by staff in his Department under the requirements of the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments in each of the last 10 years by (a) staff of grade 3 and above, (b) staff below grade 3, (c) staff in sections concerned with procurement or contract work, under section 15 of the rules of 1 February 1993 and (d) staff in other sections, under section 14; and how many of these reports were followed by an application to join the company concerned.

The Attorney-General: Since the Crown Prosecution Service was formed in 1986, there have been two instances of job offers reported by staff under section 14 of the rules. One came from a former member of staff at grade 3—1990—and the other from a member of staff at grade 5—1992. In each instance, the member of staff applied to join the organisation concerned. Since the Serious Fraud Office was formed in 1988, one approach on behalf of an outside employer has been reported under section 14 by a member of staff at grade 6—1993. This did not result in an application to join the organisation concerned. In none of these three instances did section 15 of the rules apply. There have been no reports in the Treasury Solicitor's Department and the legal secretariat to the Law Officers.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General how many contracts his Department has had with consultants; and what has been the total cost in each of the last five years.

The Attorney-General [pursuant to his reply, 23 March 1994, c. 335-36]: Certain additional costs have been identified by the Crown Prosecution Service for 1992-93 and 1993-94. The revised information is set out in the table.

Department	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93	1993-94

PRIME MINISTER

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to ratify the 11th protocol to the European convention on human rights.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom signed protocol 11 to the European convention on human rights on 11 May 1994, the date on which it was opened for signature. We intend to ratify the protocol in due course.

Student Awards

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister if the Departments of Social Security and of Employment and the Department for Education will jointly address funding of students aged over 19 years on full-time courses following the reduction in availability of discretionary awards.

The Prime Minister: Full-time higher education students at undergraduate level are generally eligible for a mandatory award, regardless of their age. The report of the independent survey of discretionary awards provision, published by the Gulbenkian Foundation on 8 April, estimates an increase of 20 per cent. in the total number of discretionary awards made between the 1990-91 and 1993-94 academic years.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is currently considering his response to the Gulbenkian report. My right hon. Friends and their Departments regularly consult on matters of mutual concern, including student support.

Government Information

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister when he plans to publish his office's guidance on the implementation of the code of practice on access to Government information, as promised at paragraph 3(ii) of the code issued on 4 April; and what has been the cause of the delay in publishing his office's guidance.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Pan Am 103

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the Government of Germany about the attitudes of the legal authorities in Scotland and Germany towards those accused of perpetrating the crime against Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie.

The Prime Minister: None. The case is in the hands of the prosecuting authorities.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 14 June.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 14 June.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

European Union

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister whether continuing membership of the European Union is dependent on member Governments being opposed to all forms of authoritarian rule in their own country; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is a fundamental principle of the European Union, reflected in both the preamble and article F of the treaty on European Union, that its member states have systems of government founded on the principles of democracy.

Correspondence

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 18 May, Official Report, column 470, if his office will seek to obtain a copy of the receipt and letter for the Ritz hotel in Paris referred to in the correspondence between the Prime Minister and Mr. Peter Preston, editor of The Guardian.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave on 18 May 1994, Official Report, column 470.

Post Office

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 24 May, Official Report, column 102, what considerations he is taking into account in determining whether a leak inquiry would be justified.

The Prime Minister: It is not the usual practice to give details about such matters.

Climate Change Conference

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he plans to attend the first conference of the parties to the Framework convention on climate change to be held in Berlin from 27 March to 7 April 1995; and what will be his targets for the conference.

The Prime Minister: No decisions have yet been taken on attendance at the conference of parties in 1995. The convention requires that meeting to resolve a number of issues relating to the operation of the convention and the implementation of parties' commitments. The United Kingdom will be looking for a successful resolution of those issues.

Civil Servants (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister how many job offers were reported by staff in his Department under the requirements of the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments in each of the last 10 years by (a) staff of grade 3 and above, (b) staff below grade 3, (c) staff in sections concerned with procurement or contract work, under section 15 of the rules of 1 February 1993 and (d) staff in other sections, under section 14; and how many of these reports were followed by an application to join the company concerned.

The Prime Minister: Information about job offers is not held centrally. For the areas covered by the Cabinet Office and Office of Public Service and Science votes, the number of applications to join companies is as follows:

Job applications under the business appointment rules

	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993

Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister what considerations underlay the Government's decision not to seek to amend the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill at Committee stage; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Although the Government share the aim of eliminating discrimination against disabled people, we favour specific legislation. Despite concerns about the Bill's clarity, affordability and practicality, we examined it in detail, in a considered way, at Committe stage to see whether any parts of it were appropriate and acceptable. Having decided that the Bill could not be accepted, the Government subsequently announced their intention to consult within six months on proposals for action in five key areas: employment, access to goods and services, financial services, access to buildings and the establishment of a new advisory body on disability.

Beggars

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received on the subject of beggars in the last three months.

The Prime Minister: I have received numerous representations.

Third-party Claims

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his letter to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 15 March, what success Her Majesty's Government have had in persuading eastern European countries, which are not yet members of the third-party liability regime, to join the convention system, and implement its provisions in their national law; and what agreements have been reached with recipient states on the indemnification of western countries for third-party claims in the event of an accident at a plant that they have assisted.

The Prime Minister: Several eastern European countries, among them Lithuania, Hungary, Poland and Romania, already belong to the Vienna convention. The Czech Republic acceded to it in March. Estonia acceded in May.

A number of other countries in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union have still to accede. This is a matter of concern to all those interested in helping them to improve nuclear safety. Every opportunity, both bilaterally and multilaterally, is being taken to persuade them of the importance of acceding to the Vienna convention and implementing its provisions in their national legislation.

The Government of the United States have concluded interim indemnity agreements with Russia and Ukraine. These cover material provided under the United States bilateral nuclear safety assistance programmes to those two countries. As an interim measure, the European Commission is continuing to negotiate an appropriate indemnity from the Governments of Russia and Ukraine for European companies involved in the European Union nuclear safety assistance programme.

HEALTH

Per Capita Expenditure

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head in cash and standard prices, for each region and nationally, on (a) hospital and community health services, (b) general practitioner services, excluding prescriptions, (c) general dental services, gross and net of charges and (d) general practitioners prescribed prescriptions for each year since 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Dr. Mawhinney: Expenditure on hospital and community health services, general practitioners' services, general dental services and general practitioner prescribed prescriptions in 1991-92 and 1992-93 will be placed in the Library.

Comparisons of per capita spend figures on hospital and community health services need to be treated with caution. First, not all the expenditure covered arises from population related activities. Secondly, crude populations do not reflect differences in age structure or relative health care need. These differences feature in the formulae used to inform the main allocations made to regional health authorities.

Primary Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head of population on primary care by family health service authority, including fundholders' budgets, in the last available year.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 26 May at column 305.

Administration Costs

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of health care spending is absorbed by administration (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the United States of America.

Dr. Mawhinney: Comparable figures are not available. There are no internationally accepted definitions of either health spending or of spending on administration of health services.

Diabetes

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has as to a causal link between the consumption of dairy products and the incidence of diabetes in children.

Mr. Sackville: While there have been suggestions of a relationship between the onset of insulin-dependent diabetes mellitus and the early introduction of cow's milk in the diet of infants, there is as yet no firm evidence of a causal link. This possibility will be examined in a study to be mounted in the south-west of England.

Coxsackie Virus

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the incidence of the coxsackie virus in England in the last two years; and in what geographical areas the problem has been identified.

Mr. Sackville: The incidence of coxsackie virus infection varies considerably between years, as in the case with many infectious diseases; the reported incidence of coxsackie virus infection was particularly low in 1993. Estimates of the incidence of coxsackie virus infection are based on voluntary reports made to the public health laboratory service communicable disease surveillance centre by microbiology laboratories throughout England and Wales. Inter-regional variation in reported incidence reflects both true variations in incidence and variations in diagnostic and reporting practice.

[1] 1993 data provisional

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research is being undertaken into the coxsackie virus in England.

Mr. Sackville: The public health laboratory service is developing new diagnostic tests for coxsackie virus infections; these new tests should overcome many of the problems currently associated with the diagnosis of coxsackie infections.

The PHLS is also undertaking a retrospective analysis of the epidemiology of coxsackie virus infections in England and Wales over the last 20 years.

Research into dilated cardiomyopathies and persistent myopericarditis due to coxsackie viruses is being conducted by a teaching hospital in London.

There is a multicentre study of myalgic encephalomyelitis that is investigating whether there is an association between ME and, among other infections, coxsackie virus infection.

The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, is supporting research at the university of Essex concerning the molecular analysis of receptors specifically in coxsackie virus A9.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 324, if she will list for each NHS trust in the Trent region, those chairmen and non-executive directors who live outside the boundaries of the district health authority area within which that trust is situated.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 16 May at column 324 and to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) on 25 May at columns 214-15. The information for national health service trusts which lie within the boundaries of the remaining health authorities in Trent region is given.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much money was spent in each health region on merit awards for consultants;

(2) how many consultants received merit awards in 1993-94 in each health region.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the numbers of consultants who received distinction awards in 1993-94 in each health region is shown in the table. Information on money spent by region is not available centrally.

Distinction awards—analysis by region
England at 31 December 1993

Region	Number
Northern	371
Yorkshire	396
Trent	499
East Anglia	251
North West Thames	475
North East Thames	670
South East Thames	531
South West Thames	357
London SHAs	402
Wessex	294
Oxford	300
South Western	325
West Midlands	528
Mersey	264
North Western	459
Total	5,893

Note: Where a consultant works in more than one region he or she has been included in the total for each.

GP Co-operatives

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, where general medical practitioners have formed co-operatives to provide out-of-hours cover for patients and those co-operatives are being provided with financial support by their local family health service authorities, that financial support is paid to the corporate body or other organisation operating the co-operative or personally to the individual general practitioners who make up the co-operative.

Dr. Mawhinney: Reimbursements under the statement of fees and allowances are made by family health services authorities to general practitioners.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made as to whether the NHS Pensions Agency policy in respect of myalgic encephalomyelitis sufferers is in line with her Department's position on the likelihood of recovery from myalgic encephalomyelitis; and what action she plans to take.

Mr. Sackville: The prognosis for any illness is a matter of clinical judgment in individual cases. The statutory requirement for the early payment of national health service pension benefits is that a person must be permanently incapable of discharging efficiently the duties of his or her employment.

Myasthenia Gravis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research the Government have commissioned into the causes and treatment of myasthenia gravis;

(2) how many people in each health region have been diagnosed as suffering from myasthenia gravis:

(3) what help and advice she has given to the Myasthenia Gravis Association.

Mr. Bowis: Figures for the numbers of people diagnosed as having myasthenia gravis who have been admitted to hospital are published in volume 1 of the "Hospital Episode Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The MRC is always willing to consider scientifically sound proposals for research. At present, the council funds two groups specifically to investigate myasthenia gravis: one at Oxford to investigate immune mechanisms and immunotherapy in myasthenia; the second at Newcastle upon Tyne investigates altering a T cell epitope in experimental autoimmune myasthenia gravis. The Myasthenia Gravis Association has not approached the Department for help or advice.

Osteoporosis

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice she is to receive regarding osteoporosis; and when she intends to publish it.

Mr. Sackville: An expert group was set up last November to provide advice on the current state of knowledge and research about osteoporosis, and what further work needs to be done. We have yet to receive the group's advice, and will need to consider in the light of it any further action that is indicated.

Private Care Homes

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the guidance issued by her Department in 1989 in regard to the placing of national health service patients in private nursing or residential homes still stands; and if she will make it her policy that no such patient will be placed in a home if this compels that patient to take personal responsibility for the charges made by the home.

Mr. Bowis: Where a person is assessed as requiring long-term care secured by the national health service and is placed in a private nursing or residential care home, the national health service will be responsible for meeting the full costs of care.

NHS Property and Land

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy for valuation reports on surplus national health service land and property prepared for regional health authorities by district valuers to be made available for public inspection after the sale has been concluded.

Mr. Sackville: It would be inappropriate for valuation reports to be publicly available, whether made by the district valuer or the private sector. Those reports are commercially confidential, and the release of price-sensitive information could disadvantage future land and property transactions.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she intends to take to ensure that NHS trusts and health authorities detail in their business plans arrangements to ensure that all staff involved in recruitment and selection receive training in fair procedures and that records are kept, as set out in the Goal One instruction contained in the document, "Ethnic Minority Staff in the NHS: A Programme for Action"; and what steps she intends to take to ensure that this requirement is drawn to the attention of general practitioners.

Dr. Mawhinney: We expect all national health service health authorities and trusts to comply with each of the relevant goals in the programme of action, and family health services authorities to ensure that general practitioners are made aware of the programme's principles of good employment practice which it contains.

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many GPs have refused to comply with the Goal One instruction contained in the document, "Ethnic Minority Staff in the NHS: A Programme for Action".

Dr. Mawhinney: Compliance is a matter for national health service employers.

Rights of the Child

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps have been taken by her Department in fulfilment of article 24, on health and health services, of the UN convention on the rights of the child adopted by the United Kingdom Government in December 1991;

(2) what steps have been taken by her Department in fulfilment of article 23(1) (2) (3) and (4), on disabled children, of the UN convention on the rights of the child adopted by the United Kingdom Government in December 1991;

(3) what steps have been taken by her Department in fulfilment of article 32, on child labour, of the UN convention on the rights of the child adopted by the United Kingdom Government in December 1991.

Mr. Bowis: The information requested is contained in the United Kingdom's first report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, which was published in March 1994, and copies of which were placed in the Library.

Health Authority Mergers

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her policy on the advertising of vacancies for chief executives designate of merged health authorities before a merger has been agreed.

Dr. Mawhinney: It is good management practice to make adequate preparations to ensure that mergers, if agreed, are effectively managed. In many cases this may necessitate advertising the post of chief executive designate in advance of the decision on the merger application being made.

Public Consultation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances it is her Department's practice, when issuing a public consultation document, to inform those consulted that their responses will be made public unless they explicitly ask for them to be kept confidential; and if she will arrange for her Department to do so in all cases in future.

Mr. Sackville: Responses to consultation documents are usually sought on the understanding they may be made public, unless those responding explicitly ask for them to remain confidential. This practice has been strengthened by the code of practice on access to government information, published in April.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether she has been consulted by, or made representations to, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on the application to the International Court of Justice on the legality of nuclear weapons made by the World Health Organisation; and what representations she has made to the World Health Organisation on its submission.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the replies the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—gave him on 1 February at column 605 and 28 February at column 547, which stated that the Government's submission to the International Court of Justice will set out the position of the Government on this issue. Relevant Departments, including the Department of Health, have therefore been consulted. The Department has made no representation to the World Health Organisation about its submission to the court.

Generic Prescribing

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will publish the name of the general practitioner achieving the highest percentage of generic prescribing;

(2) what percentage of (a) fundholder and (b) non-fundholder general practitioners are prescribing (i) 50 to 55 per cent., (ii) 55 to 60 per cent., (iii) 60 to 65 per cent. and (iv) 65 to 70 per cent. generically.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is not available centrally.

Disciplinary Procedures

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recommendation was made by the joint working party on disciplinary procedures in relation to monitoring of the procedures, collection of data and the reviewing of the procedures; to what extent this recommendation has been implemented; and what data have been collected.

Dr. Mawhinney: A joint working party to review hospital and community doctors' and dentists' disciplinary procedures reported in 1988. One recommendation was:

> "Arrangements for monitoring the new procedures, including the regular collection of data, should be introduced and that the effectiveness of the procedures should be reviewed after a period of three years from the date of implementation".

Circular HC(90)9, copies of which are available in the Library, asked authorities to maintain anonymised returns of cases brought under the new procedures in order to inform a new joint working party which would review that circular. The new JWP was established in April 1993 and information gathered. However, it did not offer a full picture because of the introduction of trusts, which are free to develop their own disciplinary procedures. We are considering the options following this review.

NHS Facilities (Visits)

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on (a) her rights and (b) the rights of the Opposition spokesperson to visit any NHS facility.

Dr. Mawhinney: I expect national health service authorities and trusts to welcome visits by hon. Members, subject only to their being able to make proper arrangements for the reception of the visitor and to avoid disruption of services to patients.

Civil Servants (Outside Appointments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many job offers were reported by staff in her Department under the requirements of the rules on the acceptance of outside appointments in each of the last 10 years by (a) staff of grade 3 and above, (b) staff below grade 3, (c) staff in sections concerned with procurement or contract work, under section 15 of the rules of 1 February 1993 and (d) staff in other sections, under section 14; and how many of these reports were followed by an application to join the company concerned.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is available for Department of Health staff from 1989. There were three staff of grade 3 and above that reported job offers: one each in 1990, 1991 and 1992, all of which resulted in formal applications to take up appointment and were subsequently approved by the Advisory Committee on Business Appointments. There were no reported job offers by staff below grade 3 or those in sections concerned with procurement or contract work.

Budget Statistics

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was (a) the staff budget and (b) the total budget in each year since 1989 for her Department and the NHS Executive.

Mr. Sackville: Information is shown in the table on the budgets for staff costs and total administration costs for the Department as a whole—including the National Health Service Executive, but excluding the agencies—and separately for the executive since 1990-91, the earliest year for which these figures are available.

	1990-91 £000's	1991-92 £000's	1992-93 £000's	1993-94 £000's

Source: Annual accounts and budgetary control reports of the Department of Health.

Notes:

1. Figures have not been adjusted for inflation.
2. Figures for the NHS Executive are not directly comparable from year to year because of organisational changes between the NHS Executive and the rest of the Department.
3. Figures for the whole Department include the NHS Executive, but do not include the Departments' agencies.

Disability

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have for participation in the European Union's third action programme for disabled people for the period 1992 to 1996.

Mr. Bowis: The Government have arranged for 78 organisations to represent the United Kingdom in the European Union's third action programme for disabled people, Handicapped People Living in Europe Independently in an Open Society—HELIOS—II, and hosted a United Kingdom HELIOS II national information day in London on 16 March 1994.

Health Authority Funding

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision was made in the cash allocations to health authorities in 1994-95 for changes in statutory sick pay regulations.

Mr. Sackville: Specific allocations are not made for individual pay or price pressures. Health authorities are expected to manage within the total resources available to them. Provided pay rises are earned through increased efficiency, hospital and community health services activity will increase by around 4 per cent. this year.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total revenue allocation for regional health authorities in each year since 1988-89, including 1994-95; and what was the percentage change in each year.

Mr. Sackville: Total cash limits for each regional health authority from 1988-89 to 1994-95 are shown in the table.

Notes: 1. Final revenue cash limits include adjustments and transfer between revenue and capital.
2. The 1994-95 figure is the initial cash limit and will be amended during the year.
3. Regional health authorities were restructured in 1994-95.
4. Up to 1990-91 regional allocations were made on the basis of the population treated within the region (catchment populations). From 1991-92 allocations have been made for resident populations irrespective of where residents are treated. Because of this change regional figures before and after 1991-92 are not strictly comparable.
5. Changes were made to the definition of capital spending in 1993-94. Some items of expenditure formally treated as capital are now treated as revenue.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total amount of cash top sliced by regional health authorities from their allocations in each year since 1988-89, including 1994-95; and what was the total cash available to district health authorities for discretionary use in each year.

Mr. Sackville: In 1993-94 regional health authorities top sliced £2 billion from their allocations for resident population and allocated £15·5 billion to district health authorities to spend on their resident population. In 1994-95 the figures were £1·8 billion and £16·6 billion respectively. Information is not available centrally prior to 1993-94.

Powered Wheelchairs

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the benefit to permanently disabled adults and children of providing them with an indoor/outdoor powered wheelchair; how many permanently disabled adults and children there are; and what would be the total cost of providing each of them with such a powered wheelchair.

Mr. Bowis: Decisions about the issue of wheelchairs, including powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs, are matters for health authorities and national health service hospital and community care units—trusts—in the light of their resources and priorities.

Excluding those on the blind register and those with mental disabilities, the number of people registered as disabled with local authorities at 31 March 1993 was 1,336,925. Of these, 679,057 were classified as being very severely, severely or appreciably handicapped. Not all of these people will require a wheelchair.

In the 12 months to 31 March 1993, the number of wheelchairs, including powered wheelchairs, on issue by the NHS in England was 179,308 and expenditure on the wheelchair service was £39,859,696. There are no figures available centrally about the total cost of providing powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs to everyone who might benefit from them.

The cost of each such wheelchair will vary considerably according to the user's needs and can range from a standard model costing around £2,500 up to £20,000 for sophisticated wheelchairs for people with very severe disabilities.

NHS Pay Settlement

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions she, or her officials, have had with representatives of the Epsom Healthcare NHS trust, regarding arrangements for meeting the pay increase recommended by the pay review bodies.

Dr. Mawhinney: The trust has advised that it will be making pay awards, agreed locally, in line with the recommendations of the national pay review bodies. These increases have been implemented with effect from 1 April 1994.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice has been issued by her Department or the NHS Executive regarding the pay settlement recommended by the pay review bodies; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what is the total number of NHS trusts which have so far declared themselves unable to fund the pay increase recommended by the pay review bodies; and if she will list them.

Dr. Mawhinney: No advice has been issued and no trusts have declared themselves unable to fund the pay increase.

Job Evaluation

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts currently have contracts with external consultants for job evaluation programmes within the trust; and what data are being collected by her Department on total expenditure on such contracts.

Dr. Mawhinney: It is for each individual national health service trust to determine whether it wishes to employ external consultants for this purpose. The information is not available centrally.

Maternal Deaths

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the numbers of (i) direct maternal deaths, (ii) indirect maternal deaths, (iii) fortuitous maternal deaths and (iv) late maternal deaths in England and Wales reported to the confidential inquiry into maternal deaths in each of the three-year periods 1985-87 and 1988-90 which were of women born in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Republic of Ireland, (c) the New Commonwealth and Pakistan, (d) other countries and (e) unstated countries.

Mr. Sackville: The information is contained in the table. Data are available for the 1988 to 1990 period only.

[2] Indirect = Pregnancy was related, but not the primary cause of death.

[3] Fortuitous = Death was unconnected with pregnancy.

[4] Late = Death occurred more than 42 days after cessation of pregnancy.
